Reflecting Mendelssohn's personality—his brilliant wit and social properness — was the "Italian Symphony." Steinberg appeared to enjoy conducting the work—in complete control of the orchestra and the work's formality and correctness. A delightful piece was delivered with ease.

Now and then his eyes would move or a smile break across his face as he gestured with hand or baton for a note or phrase that needed accenting.

He seemed more serious and possessed of more emotional force in the Beethoven work. Effecting a transition from the emotional restraint of the very proper Mendelssohn to the fierce concentration of the ugly and social outcast Beethoven was not an easy task for any conductor. But it was a successful one for Steinberg.

The piece itself is one of contrasts—from tonality to tempi to style. Without undue or prolonged emphasis of the "knock knock" motive in the first movement Steinberg evinced excellent timing in the Beethoven. From the start to the very demolition of the motive the conductor was in control.

When the second movement was given—where two themes are introduced, as was Haydn's liking—Steinberg was there with the timing again—with the first theme in the violas and cellos and the second in the clarinets and basses.

By the time he had reached the third movement, with its famous scherzo and trio—and the horns bringing back the motive—Steinberg was wrapped up in the change of the work, most importantly the change in tonality. Even in the humorous trio Steinberg showed involvement in the work with closed eyes and tight lips.

The emphasis of tonality in the last movement and the grand finale to this piece of contrasting tempi was glorious and, as mentioned before, was rewarded with a standing ovation and seven encores.

Between these two works of contrast was another "different" one. The "endless melody" and transitional ease of Wagner in excerpts from "Flight of the Gods" was a good test of timing in itself. Steinberg threw some "punches" at the brass section to get the loudness demanded by the score and brought the entire program together with them. Mendelssohn would have been appalled at such rudeness and boisterous sound and Beethoven would have gloried in it.

Steinberg gloried in them all.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
American (e)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,200
AUG 3 1964

Tanglewood Audiences Impressed

(Special to The American)

LENOX, MASS. — Guest conductors at Tanglewood which presented William Steinberg on Friday evening and Eugene Ormandy on Saturday night brought the weekly total to 26,747, presenting Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster as solist, and Erich Leinsdorf, regular conductor, yesterday afternoon. The music ranged from that of Beethoven, Brahms, Mahler, Dvorak, Bartok and the inevitable Strauss of this season's programming. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was in fine form, played magnificently with a few minor lapses and the audiences were delighted. The weatherman cooperated until he sent a light drizzle just before yesterday afternoon's concert, not enough to bother but perhaps just enough to cut attendance down to 5,470. Just a few short of 5,000 attended the Saturday morning open rehearsal concert with proceeds for the orchestra's pension fund.

Yesterday morning in the theater-concert hall Friends of the Orchestra heard an excellent performance of music of Johann Sebastian Bach with Eduardo Mata conducting the "Cantata No. 99" and Seymour Lipkin, pianist, conducting "Cantata No. 140." The young voices and the student orchestra acquitted themselves nobly. It was a rare treat to hear this fine program.

Yesterday afternoon's program brought together music of Dvorak and Bartok, the one with his Bohemian influences, the other with his Hungarian flavors. The orchestra gave each a magnificent reading under the intriguing direction of Erich Leinsdorf. The performance of Strauss' prelude and waltz sequence from "Der Rosenkavalier" was done with such grace and lightness it had one gliding ni his seat. The Dvorak was done brilliantly with great spirit. Mr. Silverstein showed his usual technical perfection in the Bartok and the audience showed its appreciation.

Mixed Reception

Saturday night's concert brought 9,811 for the Beethoven "Overture to Leonore, No. 1," and the Beethoven, "Symphony No. 1" Mahler's "Symphony in D Major, No. 1" received a mixed reception from those who can take or leave Mahler but they were apparently of one accord that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had given it a rich full performance.

For Friday night's concert William Steinberg conducted music of Piston, Brahms' "Symphony No. 1, in C Minor" and "Don Quixote" of Strauss with Samuel Mayes, violoncello soloist, and Joseph dePasquale, viola soloist. The audience numbered 5,439.

Next Week End

Concerts this week end will see Richard Burgin, retired concertmaster of the orchestra, conducting Friday night in a program of Tchiakovsky, Schuller, and Debussy's "La Mer." It will be a week end with vocal music receiving a significant part of the programming. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Saturday night and Sunday afternoon. Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" with soloists and the Festival Chorus will be presented Saturday night as well as Menotti's "Death of the Bishop of Brindisi." Sunday afternoon's program will include music of Hindemith, Schumann, Liszt's "Fantasie on Themes from Ruins of Athens" and Strauss' "Parergon." Jorge Bolet, pianist, will be the soloist in the last two numbers. Over the week end concert-goers will hear five works not previously performed at Tanglewood.

S.M.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
AUG 1 1964

Soloists Excel In Tone Poem 'Don Quixote'

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will leave to join the Philadelphia Orchestra in September, were given prominent solo assignments Friday night in the program chosen by William Steinberg for his second appearance this summer as guest conductor at Tanglewood.

Written by Strauss

Samuel Mayes, cellist, and Joseph de Pasquale, violist, both first chair men, played the solo parts as Don Quixote and Sancho Panza during the tone poem about Cervante's benighted knight written by Strauss in his youth.

"Don Quixote" is a collection of 10 variations set between an introduction and a finale. Each of the variations can be imagined to portray one of Don Quixote's famous fantasies. He tilts at windmills, sheep, pilgrims and monks and finally reaches tranquility and sanity.

The piece is full of unpredictable twists and turns, is unusually difficult to play and uses a few uncommon instruments in its efforts to portray the Don's eccentricities.

Wind Machine

There is a wind machine, for instance, which whistles and wails while Quixote and Panza imagine they are flying when they sit blindfolded on a wooden horse.

The Boston Orchestra brought much clarity to this piece Friday under the guidance of Steinberg, but at the expense of some of its usual unity.

Several passages were begun without the universal togetherness the 100-plus ensemble ordinarily displays and, in fact, did display 20 minutes later when it moved into the security of Brahm's First Symphony after intermission.

Well Cast in Solos

Mayes and De Pasquale were well cast for their solo characterizations. Pasquale's viola was properly gutty and virile for the loyal Panza, and the mild, diffident tonal quality of Mayes' cello was right in character for the vague and searching mind of the misguided polite knight.

The only quibble about Mayes' view of Quixote that comes to mind quickly is the number of swoops and scoops he used to approach notes that might better have been hit on the nose.

The orchestra approached the Brahms symphony with more control, more surety and, surprisingly, more drama.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
x 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 93,580
AUG 1 1964

AT TANGLEWOOD

'Toccata' By Piston Presented

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Once again, Friday at Tanglewood failed to draw a large audience, not apparently from any fault of programming. Last night, clear skies were offset by cool air. But the concert was glorious.

The 5,439 listeners heard "Toccata" by the modern New Englander, Walter Piston; rich and varied orchestral hues in the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Don Quixote," and the stress and beauties of the Brahams Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

William Steinberg, of Pittsburgh, continued to make his deep impression on the Berkshire Festival as a musician of direct methods, great sincerity and unfailing insight. Tonight Eugene Ormandy will make his last appearance of the summer in a program of Beethoven and Mahler. Tomorrow afternoon, Erich Leinsdorf offers Dvorak's Sixth and the Richard Strauss waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier," also concertmaster Joseph Silverstein in the Bartok Concerto No. 2.

Gazette Review

Piston's "Toccata" left me doubtful as to whether the composer was deliberately using the bulk and inertia of wind phrases to offset and temper the sharp edges of string remarks. The mid-section brought luscious interwoven melodies for woodwinds.

The demented knight who jousted with windmills found an eloquent spokesman in Samuel Mayes, first cellist. His treatment of the Don Quixote themes leaned toward the gentle and sympathetic, and Steinberg also brought out the thoughtful and human aspects of the tremendous score. Joseph de Pasquale, first viola player, wss roundly applauded as the Don's servant, Sancho Panza.

Steinberg kept the tensions of the Brahms First continually in view, capping mighty struggles with hints of victory, maintaining the bittersweet quality in the slow movement, and developing much drama in the whimsical and sentimental memories of the scherzo. Spendid hymns moved the finale along lines some have compared to the Beethoven Ninth.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
AUG 3 1964

Music Review

Weekend at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FINAL concert of the fifth Berkshire Festival week was chosen entirely from one shelf of the musical library. War and world events have made it difficult to keep boundaries and nations clear and distinct, but Richard Strauss, Antonin Dvorak and Bela Bartok are all from one general background. True, one must concede that Strauss for this occasion is Viennese, as that was where he placed his opera "Der Rosenkavalier," but what were once called Magyars and Bohemians have new and different names today.

Music librarians have had trouble identifying Dvorak's D Major Symphony. It is numbered in the order that it was published but not in the order written. That point is not important. It was his first try at a symphony and he poured out what was in his warm, cheerful soul. There are no conflicts nor catastrophes; simply the peace of a summer night and the contentment of country people, the joy of nature and the exuberant carefree spirit of young dancers. At its most contrapuntal involvements, it still remains transparent, especially as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday under the discipline of their conductor, Erich Leinsdorf.

* * *

THE SONORITIES are deeply pleasing. We in America got to know him 10 years later, but the music he wrote here had the same characteristics. The man never became a cosmopolitan. He yearned for his beloved homeland all the time he was here, and that kind of loyalty showed in all his music.

Bartok was a great student of the folk tunes of his country, but he did not use them at all in the same manner as Dvorak had absorbed the airs of his own people. He writes with free invention, almost improvises, and soars off into musical space, always securely tonal, but with pungent dissonance and rhythmic intricacy.

* * *

CONCERTMASTER Joseph Silverstein was the soloist in Bartok's Concerto No. 2, and he played with alternate abandon and supplication. He produces no note in any situation which does not have depth and smoothness, if desired, but the flights of fancy Bartok invites a soloist to take found Silverstein superbly able to master every possible pitfall. Bartok writes a short introduction before the violin enters. It is for harp and plucked strings and is as right and effective for what is to follow as a whole set of scenery and lights. The orchestra is an integral part of the concerto and Leinsdorf's collaboration was a distinct factor in the triumph Silverstein scored.

Eugene Ormandy

* * *

THE SEQUENCE of waltzes Strauss chose from his opera is a typically Viennese dance. We would concede that no one plays them with more authority and flexibility than Leinsdorf. They are pure delight.

* * *

ON THE PRECEDING evening, Eugene Ormandy was welcomed back again as guest conductor. He played Beethoven and Mahler, the first symphony of each man, beginning the concert with the overture to Leonore No. 1.

Anyone who enjoys the illusion that music comes to a composer in a moment or inspiration might well inspect the situation which applied to Beethoven's single opera, "Fidelio," which he once thought to call "Leonore." He sketched and tried four different complete overtures before he was satisfied. The one Ormandy played is rarely heard. All of it was not discarded in the later attempts and fragments are recognizable to anyone who knows them better.

Ormandy used a reduced orchestra for the overture and also for the First Symphony. He undoubtedly felt justified in this procedure. We cannot say we found the performance altered for the better. Indeed, it was correct leading to dullness.

* * *

FOR THE LAST 36 bars of the Mahler First Symphony five percussion players pound their instruments only a little less than incessantly. Seven horns blow with all force and five trumpets, with bells up with Ormandy's abetment, puff their cheeks crimson. If the ovation he received was due to this ear-splitting production, it should be discounted. If the audience of 9,811 showed their approval for the way the orchestra played so many other of the precious fragments Mahler inserted, there would be ample reason for the demonstration the performance evoked.

The symphony is saturated with thematic material from Mahler's own songs, and in the third movement he uses a well-known children's round, "Frere Jacques, dormez-vous?", giving a single muted contrabass, here well - played by principal Georges Moleux, the announcement after two prefatory bars for tempered kettledrums. Mahler closes all the movements but this one with a violent concluding bang, and even here he breaks the quiet close by a triple fortissimo chord in the fourth movement which follows without a pause. There is surely reason to debate whether this was musically valid or just theatrically purposeful.

* * *

RAIN in the early afternoon yesterday must have affected the plans of many who may have thought to come sit on the surrounding lawns, but, even so, the audience of 5,470 seemed to produce as much elation and enthusiasm as larger ones on other occasions.

Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,435
AUG 2 1964

Music: Ormandy Conductor At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The combination of Beethoven and Mahler attracted 9,811 persons to Tanglewood last night for the second concert of the Berkshire Music Festival's fifth weekend.

Eugene Ormandy guest-conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 1 Opus 138. Symphony No. 1 in C Major, Opus 21 and Mahler's Symphony in D Major, No. 1.

Neither Beethoven work has impressive stature by comparison with most of his symphonic repertory. And any other Mahler symphony but [illegible] have whittled away the cheerful atmosphere engendered by the Beethoven.

Discarded as Unworthy

Ormandy must have selected the first "Leonore" Overture mainly for reasons of revival. It was discarded by the composer as being unworthy, and he followed it with three more attempts to give his "Fidelio" opera a suitable overture.

Leonore first's association with the opera is of no importance in concert performance. But the fact remains that it certainly didn't reach any great height last night.

It suffered mainly from poor synchronization in intricate passages where [illegible] moved [illegible] section. Some [illegible] were pretty ragged.

Results Admirable

Ormandy himself treated it with infinite care. Due to this, there were still many things to admire about the results. Melody was kept out front surmount-ing extended passage of mild interest. Timpani was heavily applied in rampaging sections, and in spots toward the end a Rossini kind of effervescence was achieved.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923

JUL 20 1964

Boston Symphony Plays Memorial for Monteux

Eugene Ormany, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., in place of Pierre Monteux, who died July 1.

* * *

THE MONTEUX memorial program included Beethoven, Ravel and Elgar as the Boston Symphony gave its best, full, resonant tone. Ormandy's conducting seemed to have not only musicianship, but imagination and insight.

The Ravel "Alborada del gracioso" was as colorful as only Ravel can be. Whether it was harp glissandos, crashes from the timpani and cymbals, pizzicato, sprightly string figures or solemn phrases from the woodwinds, there was never a lackluster moment.

The Elgar "Enigma" Variations, each a muscial portrait of a friend of the composer, concluded the unusually fine program.

* * *

SKETCHED with affection, each portrait seemed to have its own entity, from whimsical to vigorous, bombastic to nostalgic. Solo episodes, effective ritards and stupendous climaxes brought the audience to its feet in an explosion of applause as the work and the concert ended.

Ormandy seemed to know the orchestra thoroughly, how to wheedle the tone down to a whisper and how to get the men to play at "impossible" tempos. And at the end he did not forget that it was the men who played the concert; he thanked them and shook hands with all front desk men before accepting the applause of the audience.

* * *

THE MAJESTY of the opening "Egmont" overture and the Beethoven "Symphony Number 4" showed the orchestra at its best. Ormandy phrasing Beethoven's highly individual themes brought out beauties one seldom realizes.

Yesterday afternoon's program drew an audience of 6,052 for the conclusion of the third week of the Tanglewood season and the first week of the full Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

THE WEEK'S total attendance amounted to 23,001. Other concerts of the week drew: 934 for the Tuesday night chamber music; 4,132, Friday night; 7,586 Saturday night, and 4,297 for the open rehearsal Saturday morning.

Erich Leinsdorf, regular conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducted Friday night and dedicated the program to the late Serge Koussevitzky. He also conducted Saturday night when the Boston Symphony was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Choir.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PARK EAST
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

AUG 6 1964

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Eugene Ormandy, conductor. Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Saturday, August 1.

Saturday evening's concert at Tanglewood, conducted by Eugene Ormandy, achieved the difficult feat of making familiar music seem new and exciting.

The first part of the program was devoted to Beethoven. Although the overture the Leonore I was given its first performance at the Berkshire Festival, it can hardly be classified as new music either to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Ormandy, or the audience. Not the best of the Leonore overtures, it nevertheless creates a mood of expectancy and drama when it is played as it was Saturday evening. The first symphony followed, full of youthful fire and imagination.

The concert ended with a brilliant performance of Mahler's 1st Symphony in D Major. This is truly a virtuoso piece for conductor and orchestra. Mr. Ormandy and the orchestra made it sound almost profound rather than an over-rich, High Romantic exercise in orchestration.

Leila R. Seigel

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
AUG 2 1964
ASS., AUGUST 2, 1964

ORMANDY VIEW OF MAHLER WORK A LITTLE LARGE?

Tanglewood Performance Of First Symphony Called 'Pompous'

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Eugene Ormandy's view of Mahler's First Symphony as performed Saturday night at Tanglewood was a big one, bigger perhaps than the composer's view of it.

Danger of Stopping?

As guest conducter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ormandy set a pace for the opening bars that, if sustained, would have stretched the 53 minute work toward infinity. Granted the beginning is supposed to be slow, but not so slow it seems in danger of stopping.

Well, anyway, the halting pace opened so much space in the music it let the clean air of spring through and that was an atmosphere Mahler said he intended to portray. There are other ways of doing it, however.

The bigness of Ormandy's view showed also at the end of the first movement and at the beginning and end of the second. Those were moments of volume, large volume. Some of it was achieved by vigorous thumps on the kettledrums and cymbals—perhaps too much of it, because the sound was rough and noisy.

First Called 'Titan'

When Mahler first conducted his symphony, he gave it the title: "The Titan." But later, when he wrote some really big symphonies, he retracted the title.

Many writers have ignored his retraction; so the music continues to be called "Titan" even though Mahler's retraction was well founded. It is not a giant symphony.

The message this report intends to transmit is that although Ormandy found many moments in the score to present with strength (the melodic middle of the second movement, for instance), he also led the orchestra over the bridge of propriety and made Mahler pompous, which, in the First Symphony at least, he is decidedly not.

Two by Beethoven

The two Beethoven works which filled the first half of the program were similar in mood if not in style and substance.

The Leonore Overture No. 1 is seldom heard, probably because Leonore No. 2 and No. 3 have so much more to offer, but it is, and was Saturday, a pleasant little confection, small, relaxed and sweet.

It was not difficult Saturday to see why the Leonore No. 1 was discarded early as an appropriate overture for Beethoven's only opera "Fidelio." It is too nice

Gracious, Amiable

The symphony No. 1 which immediately followed it was similar in mood because of its happy inheritance from Mozart and Haydn.

It is a gracious, amiable and gentle symphony, full of the niceties of 18th Century classicism but, nevertheless, hinting at the stronger brew yet to come from Beethoven.

Ormandy led it with flair and grace. It had a suppleness that was lost during intermission and sorely needed in the Mahler symphony.

Not for nothing was Mahler the musical descendant of the German tradition, but practically none of that tradition was able to leap the 20 minute intermission.

The brilliant sounds of Prokofieff, Stravinsky and other painters of blinding colors appeared instead. As entertaining as they are, they were out of [illegible] with Mahler Saturday.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
AUG 3 1964

Ormandy Leads Symphony in Whirlwind Tour of Mahler's First

Sunday Concert at Tanglewood

The ARTS

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX—Ormandy's interpretation of the Mahler First Symphony is unorthodox, even shocking. It is by no means bad. Its most special feature is its speed, and must say that I would hardly have thought it possible to have the piece reduced to 46 minutes and have it remain intelligible.

Yet I found that the purely external element of having the events proceed from one to the other with such dispatch made many of the large relationships intelligible to me in a way that they hardly have been in performance, however clear they were in the score or however familiar and well understood intellectually.

Key relationships, which are among the most original inventions in the score, came out with unaccustomed drama in this performance, not only the spectacular one like the finale's [illegible] but also the more quiet moments like the slow movement's unexpected recapitulation in E flat minor.

Ormandy is inclined to streamline the piece. He now and again zips across bridges that could well stand a little more rhetorical emphasis.

He seems simply not to have the patience to evoke the atmosphere of motionless mystery that I am sure Mahler was after in the opening pages. However suspenseful and effective, the music there was not slow and dragging as Mahler asked that it should be.

The scherzo also moved at great speed, certainly faster than the suggested metronome mark of 66 to a measure, but not out of line with the direction "kraeftig bewegt"—"movingly along powerfully."

tempo a bit when the tune came in. More than any conductor I recall he produced the deadpan, almost uninflected blandness in the canon that is needed, and except for the badly flat tuba playing, those pages would have been a perfect success. Also, I have never heard the G major episode done with such delicacy and beautiful a sound.

Throughout, the delicacy of the performance was something in which to take great pleasure. The big D flat major melody in the last movement was kept beautifully down and to an amazing degree Ormandy over and over again solved successfully that quintessentially mahlerian problem that defeats so many conductors, namely that of being expressive and powerfully repressed at the same time. Or, to put it in more immediately musical terms, to be "expressive" within a framework of pianissimo and the most delicate accentuations.

If anything, the performance could have done with a little more ham.

There could well have been a larger, and more frightening, "luftpause" before the finale's headlong plunge into D major, reaching the symphony's home key for the first time since the end of the first movement.

I have never heard the third movement's Bohemian band music with its wildly exaggerated upbeats done with such restraint, and I must admit to not being quite sure that that is really right.

The performance was unorthodox, but it offered a new perspective and one that I found interesting and instructive. Moreover the conception was worked out and carried out with a commendable consistency.

Before leading the Mahler, Ormandy conducted Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 1 and the First Symphony. Both performances were blunt, unfussy, heavy, not really bad, but without being at all good unless by virtue of the omission of sins.

The orchestra playing was a bit crude: whenever there was a change of texture the seams showed in the rhythm. Also Ormandy encourages violence. He is not a man who can simply take the end of Beethoven's Scherzo as the conclusion of a formal design; he has to make a smash-bang production of it.

His attention to potentially dramatic detail can have good results: the symphony's opening measures were uncommon-

89

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
AUG 6 1964

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

TANGLEWOOD

Friday Evening
By C.D.

William Steinberg for the second time this season took over the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood on Friday evening in a program which included a recent work of Piston, The Don Quixote of Strauss, and Brahms' First Symphony.

The Piston work, a Toccata, was obviously not Mr. Steinberg's dish of tea, if one is to judge by the ragged performance it received. But the Strauss and Brahms pieces were another matter.

Don Quixote is one of Strauss' greatest orchestral compositions, and if some modern ears object to the dripping sentimentality of the music, they must consider the subject and the era in which it was written and above all, they must admire the consummate mastery of orchestral sonorities. The soloists, Samuel Mayes, cellist, and Joseph dePasquale, violist, as well as all the other first chair men in the orchestra, contributed in making this a glowing performance

So often the last movement in the First Brahms Symphony sounds sectional, episodic and "square;" but it was not so last Friday evening. The impression of inevitable continuity that Steinberg achieved in the Brahms was a triumph of conducting. The cheers and easily to a Tanglewood audience were never more richly merited than they were after this performance.

Saturday Evening
By C.D.

On Saturday night Eugene Ormandy conducted. For more than 30 years American audiences have known him to be a superb conductor, and for many more years than that we have known that Beethoven was a superb composer. What then is to be said about the first half of the program—all Beethoven — and including the seldom heard first version of the Leonore Overture and the ever-fresh First Symphony? A plus A still makes 2A, and Ormandy conducting Beethoven still adds up to 2A.

After the intermission came the Mahler First Symphony Mahler has never quite caught on in this country, and Ormandy with others has tried to remedy American lethargy to the Mahler symphonies. Juding by the fervent reception of the Mahler work on Staurday night, thousands of new converts to the Mahler cult were made.

Sunday Afternoon
By A. C. Sly

A little child was dashing about in front of the stage, when Erich Leinsdorf mounted the podium. The conductor suggested that he sit down and enjoy the music. That is what he and the rest of the audience did for it was a program that had appeal for a wide variety of musical taste and was performed superbly.

The Symphony in D Major, Op. 60, by Dvorak, was the opening work. It is rarely done and one wonders why, for it abounds in pleasing melodies and catchy rhythms, and the Bohemian folk quality is a welcome change from a rather steady diet of French and German music. It was refreshing to hear, and the BSO gave it a spine-tingling performance

Joseph Silverstein was soloist in Bartok's Second Violin Concerto. It was an extraordinary performance in many respects. Mr. Silverstein is so self-effacing, perhaps because he is concertmaster of the orchestra, that one tended to forget he was a soloist.

Bartok has written a fiendishly difficult score which makes tremendous demands on the artist, but Mr Silverstein met them all with aggravating ease. Leinsdorf fused the varied elements into an exciting whole.

By way of giving an added fillip to an already satisfying afternoon, the concert closed, with the popular Prelude and Waltz Sequence from Der Rosenkavalier. It was done with elegance, and sent the audience away singing.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,427
AUG 8 1964

Mahler's First, Too Fast Or Two Slow At Tanglewood; No Clocks

Was Mahler's First Symphony played fast or slow at Tanglewood on Saturday night? After it was all over, one critic wrote that it took 46 minutes and was so fast to be almost shocking, while another clocked it as 53 minutes and said it was so slow it seemed to be in danger of stopping. We did not clock it.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the Mahler work under the baton of guest conductor Eugene Ormandy in a program that opened with Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 1 and also included Beethoven's First Symphony.

The previous night, on Friday, another guest conductor led the orchestra. This was William Steinberg, making his second guest appearance at Tanglewood. Another of the works of Richard Strauss, whose centennial is being celebrated this year, was presented this time "Don Quixote," a marvelously colorful composition. Samuel Mayes, cellist, and Joseph dePasquale, violist, were soloists. The program opened with Toccata by Piston and concluded with the great First Symphony of Brahms.

On Sunday afternoon the orchestra returned to the hands of its director Erich Leinsdorf and played two works new to the Berkshire Festival: Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 and Bartok's Violin Concerto No. 2, with Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program ended lightly and gaily with the Rosenkavalier Waltzes of Strauss.

Mr. Leinsdorf is generous in sharing the podium at Tanglewood this season, but he has become such a drawing card himself that the guests do not outshine him. Next weekend he will lead the Saturday and Sunday concerts himself, and on Friday Richard Burgin, former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will conduct, so one might say that the orchestra will be at home with its own.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451
AUG 3 1964

Music: Bartok Highlight At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Highlight of yesterday afternoon's Berkshire Music Festival concert at Tanglewood was a brilliant performance of Bartok's Second Violin Concerto with Joseph Silverstein as solist and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

This was the final concert of the festival's fifth week. Attendance was 5,470, bringing the weekend total to 26,747.

Also Dvorak

Because famous names don't necessarily guarantee a memorable concert, a certain amount of risk was involved in yesterday's program. In addition to the Bartok it had Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 in D Major, Opus 60, and Richard Stauss' prelude and waltz sequence from the opera, "Dr Rosenkevalier."

The only work of cross - section interest, Dvorak's Sixth Symphony was his first to be published (1882). It's been generally accepted that Dvorak wrote five symphonies, the last being the "New World". Four earlier Dvorak symphonies were more recently exhumed which upset the listing. Anyhow, Symphony No. 6 was composed in 1880.

It's been pretty much neglected ever since until dusted off for a performance.

At Symphony Hall, Boston, last November, and yesterday at Tanglewood.

Dvorak's Sixth Symphony excelled in three areas — The opening theme of the slow movement, rapid part of the scherzo, or "Furiant," and the entire finale. Elsewhere, it did not exactly soar to the heavens.

Bohemian Themes

Generally, it is filled with natural melody that follows well-marked paths. The first movement has certain theatrical effects, borrowed from a sizable number of composers but always seasoned with infectious Bohemian melodies and nationalistic style.

Opening of the slow movement promised a stream of Slavic melody that did not materialize. It had frequent solos in woodwinds and sentimental dialogue. But material was stretched beyond interest, although rescued somewhat by fragments of expressive tunes, best of which were found in the cello section.

The third movement, "Furiant," is a teeming Bohemian dance, much in the manner of Dvorak's short but brilliant Slavonic dances.

It made a dazzling effect with its compulsive rhythm and rich modal hues. The finale was a grandiose affair, darting from one rhapsodic idea to another. Leinsdorf gave it steady drive and the climax was ushered in with penetrating brasses. The furious string passages at the end were dazzling.

Virtuoso Technique

Boston Symphony concertmaster Silverstein is a poised artist, in admirable command of his metier. He has a virtuoso technique, but also the ability to play as a poet.

He elicited a warm, impressionable tone in sections of all three movements. Most glowing was the opening statement of the first movement and the plaintive andante which he related with rich sound and emotional depth. The six variations of the slow movement disclosed the soloists musicianship and compelling showmanship, devoid of any form of extraneous action.

The first movement Cadenza was virtuosic execution, also the bristling finale. It was outstanding performance in every sense, including excellent collaboration by conductor and orchestra.

Strauss' "Rosenkavalier" excerpts were included as part of the composer's birth-centenary, being observed this summer at Tanglewood. The prelude was followed by the first of two waltz sequences that appear in the operatic production.

Frothy Dessert

Yesterday, "Rosenkavalier" was something like a light dessert to end a heavy meal. The music was richly nuanced. Rhythems were appropriately lilting. Playing was expert and conducting had every evidence of enthusiasm.

The festival resumes next Friday night when Richard Burgin, associate conductor and former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will be on podium. The program is Tchaikovsky's Gunther Schuller's Seven Studies on Themes of Pau Klee, sixth or "Pathetique" symphony and Debussy's "La Mer."

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
Transcript
Eve. Circ. 13,240
AUG 3 1964

At Tanglewood

Orchestra Plays Superbly Under Three Conductors

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

This weekend's concerts at Tanglewood conducted by William Steinberg, Eugene Ormandy and Mr. Leinsdorf were again as unblemished as last week when these same men mounted the podium.

Such frequent shift of conductors does little to change the established character of the orchestra, but it does seem to promote something in the way of even greater performing skill within the group.

More to Come

The remaining concerts will continue to bring a variety of conductors. Richard Burgin, the associate conductor of the orchestra, will return next week with a performance of works by Tchaikovsky, Schuller and Debussy. The following weeks will bring Max Rudolf, Leopold Stokowski and also the rising young Japanese conductor, Seiji Ozawa.

There appears this year what might seem to be a contest among the conductors to direct sans score. Mr. Leinsdorf appears quite at home without score, but some others can readily be seen counting sequential material on their fingers.

To a few, conducting without score is a natural, but to most others it is a daring and risky trick. Koussevitsky would himself on occasion dispense with the score, but he did confide that he thought the practice fool-hardy for those who could not memorize easily and dependably. However, it could not be said that, trick or not, there had been any large evidence of detraction to the impeccable programs thus far this season.

Strauss Example

Strauss' Don Quixote variations, conducted by Mr. Steinberg with soloists Samuel Mayes, cellist, and Joseph de Pasquale, viola, was this week's prime example of impeccable performance. This is, by the way, the last solo performance scheduled for those two principals of the BSO, since both will leave at the close of this season to join, in equal positions, Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra. They made the most in this final display of their large talents with a technique that produced a spellbinding expression to the music. The work, with its resort to wind machine, baaing sheep, etcetera, doesn't generally appeal too widely among musicians. However, this audience will likely, years hence, remark after some performance of the work, "But you should have heard it with Mayes and de Pasquale in '64."

The Piston Toccata, new to Tanglewood and this reviewer, was first performed in Bridgeport in 1948. Charles Munch, then making a tour of America with the French National Orchestra, had requested a work of Piston to perform on the tour. The piece is short and brilliantly rhythmic with a complex and tight harmonic texture that is still dissarmingly conservative and pleasing. That the BSO can perform such a work as this Toccatta or the Bartok Violin Concerto, performed Sunday, and still maintain its phenomenal tone and ensemble, is what makes the orchestra what it is, superb.

Beethoven and Mahler

Mr. Ormandy's program of Bethoven's Overture and First Symphony were of remarkable quality, but what was accomplished to refreshen Mahler's First Symphony was incredible. Portions that might have sounded heretofore trivial or inconsequential, Ormandy lighted with sound of refined eloquence. This stands among the many performances this summer which serve to justify the importance of performance to music of marginal quality.

Bartok's Voilin Concerto is far tighter than Piston's Toccata and unfortunately seems to show it. Though the virtuoso solo portion has the reputation of immense difficulty, Mr. Silverstein seldom evidenced the opinion. Mr. Silverstein performs in a polished but diminutive manner that allows as little risk as possible. However, with the minimum risk akin to traversing Niagara in a barrel of bottles, there can be nothing but wonder for so successful a feat.

TIMES UNIO
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 58,797 SUN. 116,10
AUG 3 1964
The Evening Bu
PHILADELPHIA, P
D. 718,167
AUG 6 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly - Circ. 3,132
AUG 6 1964

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

TANGLEWOOD

Friday Evening
By C.D.

William Steinberg for the second time this season took over the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood on Friday evening in a program which included a recent work of Piston, The Don Quixote of Strauss, and Brahms' First Symphony.

The Piston work, a Toccata, was obviously not Mr. Steinberg's dish of tea, if one is to judge by the ragged performance it received. But the Strauss and Brahms pieces were another matter.

Don Quixote is one of Strauss' greatest orchestral compositions, and if some modern ears object to the dripping sentimentality of the music, they must consider the subject and the era in which it was written and above all, they must admire the consummate mastery of orchestral sonorities. The soloists, Samuel Mayes, cellist, and Joseph dePasquale, violist, as well as all the other first chair men in the orchestra, contributed in making this a glowing performance.

So often the last movement in the First Brahms Symphony sounds sectional, episodic and "square;" but it was not so last Friday evening. The impression of inevitable continuity that Steinberg achieved in the Brahms was a triumph of conducting. The cheers and easily to a Tanglewood audience were never more richly merited than they were after this performance.

Saturday Evening
By C.D.

On Saturday night Eugene Ormandy conducted. For more than 30 years American audiences have known him to be a superb conductor, and for many more years than that we have known that Beethoven was a superb composer. What then is to be said about the first half of the program—all Beethoven — and including the seldom heard first version of the Leonore Overture and the ever-fresh First Symphony? A plus A still makes 2A, and Ormandy conducting Beethoven still adds up to 2A.

After the intermission came the Mahler First Symphony Mahler has never quite caught on in this country, and Ormandy with others has tried to remedy American lethargy to the Mahler symphonies. Juding by the fervent reception of the Mahler work on Staurday night, thousands of new converts to the Mahler cult were made.

Sunday Afternoon
By A. C. Sly

A little child was dashing about in front of the stage, when Erich Leinsdorf mounted the podium. The conductor suggested that he sit down and enjoy the music. That is what he and the rest of the audience did for it was a program that had appeal for a wide variety of musical taste and was performed superbly.

The Symphony in D Major, Op. 60, by Dvorak, was the opening work. It is rarely done and one wonders why, for it abounds in pleasing melodies and catchy rhythms, and the Bohemian folk quality is a welcome change from a rather steady diet of French and German music. It was refreshing to hear, and the BSO gave it a spine-tingling performance.

Joseph Silverstein was soloist in Bartok's Second Violin Concerto. It was an extraordinary performance in many respects. Mr. Silverstein is so self-effacing, perhaps because he is concertmaster of the orchestra, that one tended to forget he was a soloist.

Bartok has written a fiendishly difficult score which makes tremendous demands on the artist, but Mr Silverstein met them all with aggravating ease. Leinsdorf fused the varied elements into an exciting whole.

By way of giving an added fillip to an already satisfying afternoon, the concert closed, with the popular Prelude and Waltz Sequence from Der Rosenkavalier. It was done with elegance, and sent the audience away singing.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451
AUG 3 1964

Music: Bartok Highlight At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Highlight of yesterday afternoon's Berkshire Music Festival concert at Tanglewood was a brilliant performance of Bartok's Second Violin Concerto with Joseph Silverstein as solist and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

This was the final concert of the festival's fifth week. Attendance was 5,470, bringing the weekend total to 24,747.

Also Dvorak

Because famous names don't necessarily guarantee a memorable concert, a certain amount of risk was involved in yesterday's program. In addition to the Bartok it had Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 in D Major, Opus 60, and Richard Strauss' prelude and waltz sequence from the opera, "Dr Rosenkevalier."

The only work of cross section interest, Dvorak's Sixth Symphony was his first to be published (1882). It's been generally accepted that Dvorak wrote five symphonies, the last being the "New World." Four earlier Dvorak symphonies were more recently exhumed which upset the listing. Anyhow, Symphony No. 6 was composed in 1880.

It's been pretty much neglected ever since until dusted off for a performance.

At Symphony Hall, Boston, last November, and yesterday at Tanglewood.

Dvorak's Sixth Symphony excelled in three areas — The opening theme, the slow movement, rapid part of the scherzo, or "Furiant," and the entire finale. Elsewhere, it did not exactly soar to the heavens.

Bohemian Themes

Generally, it is filled with natural melody that follows well-marked paths. The first movement has certain theatrical effects, borrowed from a sizable number of composers but always seasoned with infectious Bohemian melodies and nationalistic style.

Opening of the slow movement promised a stream of Slavic melody that did not materialize. It had frequent solos in woodwinds and sentimental dialogue. But material was stretched beyond interest, although rescued somewhat by fragments of expressive tunes, best of which were found in the cello section.

The third movement, "Furiant," is a teeming Bohemian dance, much in the manner of Dvorak's short but brilliant Slavonic dances.

It made a dazzling effect with its compulsive rhythm and rich modal hues. The finale was a grandiose affair, darting from one rhapsodic idea to another. Leinsdorf gave it steady drive and the climax was ushered in with penetrating brasses. The furious string passages at the end were dazzling.

Virtuoso Technique

Boston Symphony concertmaster Silverstein is a poised artist, in admirable command of his metier. He has a virtuoso technique, but also the ability to play as a poet.

He elicited a warm, impressionable tone in sections of all three movements. Most glowing was the opening statement of the first movement and the plaintive andante which he related with rich sound and emotional depth. The six variations of the slow movement disclosed the soloists musicianship and compelling showmanship, devoid of any form of extraneous action.

The first movement Cadenza was virtuosic execution, also the bristling finale. It was outstanding performance in every sense including excellent collaboration by conductor and orchestra.

Strauss' "Rosenkavalier" excerpts were included as part of the composer's birth-centenary, being observed this summer at Tanglewood. The prelude was followed by the first of two waltz sequences that appear in the operatic production.

Pretty Dessert

Yesterday, "Rosenkavalier" was something like a light dessert to end a heavy meal. The music was richly nuanced. Rhythems were appropriately lilting. Playing was expert and conducting had every evidence of enthusiasm.

The festival resumes next Friday night when Richard Burgin, associate conductor and former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will be on podium. The program is Tchaikovsky's Gunther Schuller's Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee, sixth or "Pathetique" symphony and Debussy's "La Mer."

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 — 242-4200
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
Transcript
Eve. Circ. 13,240
AUG 3 1964

At Tanglewood

Orchestra Plays Superbly Under Three Conductors

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

This weekend's concerts at Tanglewood conducted by William Steinberg, Eugene Ormandy and Mr. Leinsdorf were again as unblemished as last week when these same men mounted the podium.

Such frequent shift of conductors does little to change the established character of the orchestra, but it does seem to promote something in the way of even greater performing skill within the group.

More to Come

The remaining concerts will continue to bring a variety of conductors. Richard Burgin, the associate conductor of the orchestra, will return next week with a performance of works by Tchaikovsky, Schuller and Debussy. The following weeks will bring Max Rudolf, Leopold Stokowski and also the rising young Japanese conductor, Seiji Ozawa.

There appears this year what might seem to be a contest among the conductors to direct sans score. Mr. Leinsdorf appears quite at home without score, but some others can readily be seen counting sequential material on their fingers.

To a few, conducting without score is a natural, but to most others it is a daring and risky trick. Koussevitsky would himself on occasion dispense with the score, but he did confide that he thought the practice fool-hardy for those who could not memorize easily and dependably. However, it could not be said that trick or not, there had been any large evidence of detraction to the impeccable programs thus far this season.

Strauss Example

Strauss' Don Quixote variations, conducted by Mr. Steinberg with soloists Samuel Mayes, cellist, and Joseph de Pasquale, viola, was this week's prime example of impeccable performance. This is, by the way, the last solo performance scheduled for those two principals of the BSO, since both will leave at the close of this season to join, in equal positions, Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra. They made the most in this final display of their large talents with a technique that produced a spellbinding expression to the music. The work, with its resort to wind machine, baaing sheep, etcetera, doesn't generally appeal too widely among musicians. However, this audience will likely, years hence, remark after some performance of the work, "But you should have heard it with Mayes and de Pasquale in '64."

The Piston Toccata, new to Tanglewood and this reviewer, was first performed in Bridgeport in 1948. Charles Munch, then making a tour of America with the French National Orchestra, had requested a work of Piston to perform on the tour. The piece is short and brilliantly rhythmic with a complex and tight harmonic texture that is still dissarmingly consonant and pleasing. That the BSO can perform such a work as this Toccata or the Bartok Violin Concerto, performed Sunday, and still maintain its phenomenal tone and ensemble, is what makes the orchestra what it is, superb.

Beethoven and Mahler

Mr. Ormandy's program of Bethoven's Overture and First Symphony were of remarkable quality, but what was accomplished to refreshen Mahler's First Symphony was incredible. Portions that might have sounded heretofore trivial or inconsequential, Ormandy lighted with sound of refined eloquence. This stands among the many performances this summer which serve to justify the importance of performance to music of marginal quality.

Bartok's Violin Concerto is no tighter than Piston's Toccata and unfortunately seems to show it. Though the virtuoso solo portion has the reputation of immense difficulty, Mr. Silverstein seldom evidenced the opinion. Mr. Silverstein performs in a polished but diminutive manner that allows as little risk as possible. However, with the minimum risk akin to traversing Niagara in a barrel of bottles, there can be nothing but wonder for so successful a feat.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,427
AUG 1964

Mahler's First, Too Fast Or Two Slow At Tanglewood; No Clocks

Was Mahler's First Symphony played fast or slow at Tanglewood on Saturday night? After it was all over, one critic wrote that it took 46 minutes and was so fast to be almost shocking, while another clocked it as 53 minutes and said it was so slow it seemed to be in danger of stopping. We did not clock it.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the Mahler work under the baton of guest conductor Eugene Ormandy in a program that opened with Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 1 and also included Beethoven's First Symphony.

The previous night, on Friday, another guest conductor led the orchestra. This was William Steinberg, making his second guest appearance at Tanglewood. Another of the works of Richard Strauss, whose centennial is being celebrated this year, was presented this time "Don Quixote," a marvelously colorful composition. Samuel Mayes, cellist, and Joseph dePasquale, violist, were soloists. The program opened with Toccata by Piston and concluded with the great First Symphony of Brahms.

On Sunday afternoon the orchestra returned to the hands of its director Erich Leinsdorf and played two works new to the Berkshire Festival: Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 and Bartok's Violin Concerto No. 2, with Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program ended lightly and gaily with the Rosenkavalier Waltzes of Strauss.

Mr. Leinsdorf is generous in sharing the podium at Tanglewood this season, but he has become such a drawing card himself that the guests do not outshine him. Next weekend he will lead the Saturday and Sunday concerts himself, and on Friday Richard Burgin, former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will conduct, so one might say that the orchestra will be at home with its own.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
AUG 3

T-U AT TANGLEWOOD

3 Conductors Share Spotlight

The distinguished American conductors: William Steinberg, of the Pittsburgh, Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia and Erich Leinsdorf of the Boston symphony orchestras, shared the podium over the weekend at Tanglewood Music Seed.

They inaugurated the second half of the eight-week season of the Berkshire Music Festival.

The three diversified concerts were an excellent opportunity for the capacity audiences to compare the technical and interpretative gifts of each maestro.

Friday night's concert was a most exciting one with Mr. Steinberg's inclusion of Walter Piston's "Toccata," a modern composition which did not assault the ears of the enthusiastic audience.

In line with Leinsdorf's plan to "explore" one particular composer's works each season (1964 being the anniversary of the birth of Richard Strauss), Mr. Steinberg offered one of the German composer's better known tone poems, "Don Quixote, Fantastic Variations On A Theme of Knightly Character," the musical setting of the famous novel by Cervantes.

The musical biography of the slightly mad cavalier was sharply etched by the conductor and the orchestra during the Introduction, ten episodes and the finale.

A note of nostalgic sadness was injected into this particular performance due to the fact that the portraits of Don Quixote and that of his companion, Cancho Panza, were represented respectively by the first cellist of the Bostonians, Samuel Mayes, and Joseph de Pasquale, first violist, who will be missing from their regular positions, next season, when they occupy similar "chairs" with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Both popular members of the string section gave their all in an unforgetable performance, after which they were accorded a strong demonstration of affection.

The final work of the evening was Mr. Steinberg's exciting conducting of Symphony No. 1 by Brahms, in my opinion the greatest "first" symphony ever written. The musical paraphrase of the Cambridge Quarters' chimes and the glorious exultation of the Hymn to Joy whipped the audience into a frenzy of enthusiastic applause.

Saturday evening's concert was a return to the standards of orchestral literature with the use of Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 1; his Symphony No. 1 and Mahler's Symphony No. 1.

Three magnificent "firsts" and all beautifully realized by Mr. Ormandy, it was a kind of preview of what is in store for music lovers at Saratoga Springs in 1966 when the Philadelphians under Mr. Ormandy open their initial summer season, sharing honors with the thoroughbreds, the devotees of Terpsichore and other allied branches of the Lively Arts.

For the final concert of Series Five yesterday afternoon, Mr. Leinsdorf returned to the conductor's stand to display his tremendous catholicity of musical taste with the use of the Dvorak Symphony No. 6; and the first performance at Tanglewood of Bartok's Violin Concerto No. 2 with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, as soloist.

The concerto with its avant garde harmonies and bizarre orchestral effects was played with effortless abandon by Mr. Silverstein, who was given a tumultuous reception at its conclusion.

Again honoring Richard Strauss, Mr. Leinsdorf featured as the closing work yesterday afternoon the prelude and waltzes from the opera Der Rosenkavalier, proving that the German composer could out-Strauss his Viennese namesake in the popular dance categories—bringing the afternoon concert to a brilliant conclusion. The total attendance for the weekend was 26,747. (E.S.V.)

The Evening Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA
AUG

Man About Town

Ormandy Is A Big Hit in Tanglewood

By Frank Brookhouser

THE FINAL CONCERT conducted by Eugene Ormandy at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood, Mass., drew an enthusiastic audience of more than 10,000 persons.

This figure was surpassed only by the concert at which the brilliant pianist, Van Cliburn, was the soloist.

And, in a way, the conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra even outdrew Cliburn, because more than 5,000 persons showed up in the morning to hear him lead the Boston Symphony through a special open rehearsal of the works to be played that evening.

Eugene Ormandy

In all, Ormandy led the orchestra in three concerts. He concluded the final one with a performance of the Mahler Symphony No. 1 which brought the audience to its feet in a standing ovation.

Ormandy took 12 curtain calls and, graciously declining to take any of the limelight away from him, members of the orchestra remained seated while he took the bows alone.

Republican (m)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 24,059
AUG 4

Tanglewood Drawing Large Crowd

(Special to The Republican

LENOX, MASS. —Guest conductors at Tanglewood which presented William Steinberg on Friday evening and Eugene Ormandy on Saturday night brought the weekly total to $26,747, presenting Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster as soloist, and Erich Leinsdorf, regular conductor, Sunday afternoon The music ranged from that of Beethoven, Brahms, Mahler, Dvorak, Bartok and the inevitable Strauss of this season's programming. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was in fine form, played magnificently with a few minor lapses and the audiences were delighted. The weatherman cooperated until he sent a light drizzle just before Sunday afternoon's concert, not enough to bother but perhaps just enough to cut attendance down to 5,470. Just a few short of 5,000 attended the Saturday morning open rehearsal concert with proceeds for the orchestra's pension fund.

Sunday morning in the theater-concert hall Friends of the Orchestra heard an excellent performance of music of Johann Sebastian Bach with Eduardo Mata conducting the "Cantata No. 99" and Seymour Lipkin, pianist, conducting "Cantata No. 140." the young voices and the student orchestra acquitted themselves nobly, It was a rare treat to hear this fine program.

The program brought together music of Dvorak and Bartok, the one with his Bohemian influences, the other with his Hungarian flavors. The orchestra gave each a magnificent reading under the intriguing direction of Erich Leinsdorf. The performance of Strauss' prelude and waltz sequence from "Der Rosenkavalier" was done with such grace and lightness it had one gliding in his seat. The Dvorak was done brilliantly with great spirit. Mr. Silverstein showed his usual technical perfection in the Bartok and the audience showed its appreciation.

Mixed Reception

Saturday night's concert brought 9,811 for the Beethoven "Overture to Leonore, No. 1," and the Beethoven, "Symphony No. 1" Mahler's "Symphony in D Major, No. 1" received a mixed reception from those who can take or leave Mahler but they were apparently of one accord that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had given it a rich, full performance.

For Friday night's concert, William Steinberg conducted music of Piston, Brahms' "Symphony No. , in C Minor" and "Don Quixote" of Strauss with Samuel Mayes, violoncello soloist, and Joseph De Pasquale, viola soloist. The audience numbered 5,439.

Next Week End

Concerts this week end will see Richard Burgin, retired concermaster of the orchestra, conducting Friday night in a program of Tchiakovsky, Schuller and Debussy's "La Mer." It will be a week end with vocal music receiving a significant part of the programming. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Saturday night and Sunday afternoon. Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" with soloists and the Festival Chorus will be presented Saturday night as well as Menotti's "Death of the Bishop of Brindisi." Sunday afternoon program will include music of Hindemith, Schumann, Liszt's "Fantasie on Themes from Ruins of Athens" and Strauss' "Parergon." Jorge Bolet, pianist, will be the soloist in the last two numbers. Over the week end concert — goers will hear five works not previously performed at Tanglewood.

S.M

92

6TH WEEK AUGUST 3RD - 9TH

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111

AUG 6 1964

The Death Strategem.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL — TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. Friday, at 8 p.m., Richard Burgin conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works by Tchaikovsky, Schuller and Debussy's "La Mer." Saturday at 10 a.m. the Open Rehearsal. Saturday at 8 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf conducts the BSO in Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," Strauss' "Three Hymns," and Menotti's "Death of the Bishop of Brindis." Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Liensdorf conducts the BSO in works by Hindemith, Schumann, Strauss and Liszt. At 8 p.m. Sunday the Festival of Contemporary American Music begins. Information call Lenox 637-1600.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

POUGHKEEPSIE JOURNAL
Sunday, August 2, 1964

Orchestra at Tanglewood Schedules Five New Works

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made known the program for next weekend at the Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Five works which have not been performed previously at the festival are included in the program, which features as soloists Jorge Bolet, pianist, Phyllis Curtin, soprano, Justino Diaz, bass, and Lili Chookasian, contralto.

Richard Burgin, associate conductor, will conduct Friday night's program which will include Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74, "Pathetique;" Gunther Schuller's "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee," a first performance, and Debussy's "La Mer."

The concerts at 8 o'clock Saturday night and 2:30 Sunday afternoon, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, will present works by Richard Strauss in the continuing observance of the composer's 100th anniversary, and works which Mr. Leinsdorf has termed as Music for Festivals. Saturday's program will open with "The Ruins of Athens," Nachspiel, Op. 113, by Beethoven, with Miss Curtin, Mr. Diaz and the Festival Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon. Miss Curtin and Mr. Diaz are former members of the Berkshire Music Center. Miss Curtin will then return to sing "Three Hymns," Op. 71, by Strauss. The program will close with the eastern premiere of Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," with Miss Chookasian, Mr. Diaz and the Festival Chorus. All the works on this program will be first performances at Tanglewood.

Next Sunday afternoon Mr. Leinsdorf will open the concert with the Symphonic Metamorphosis by Paul Hindemith, who died last fall. He will continue with Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120. After intermission Mr. Bolet will join the orchestra for the first Tanglewood performance of Strauss' "Parergon," for left hand alone," which has been performed only once before in this country, in 1934. Mr. Bolet and the orchestra will close the program with Liszt's Fantasie on Themes from "Ruins of Athens," of which Mr. Leinsdorf will have conducted the complete work the night before.

The weekend will culminate next Sunday night with the first program of the Berkshire Music Center's five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music, Aug. 9-13, presented in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation. The program Sunday night at 8 o'clock in the theater will be performed by the Fromm Fellows and will begin the presentation of works by contemporary young American composers who have not yet gained national recognition, including 10 works commissioned especially for this festival.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 161,219 SUN. 304,523

AUG 2 1964

BERKSHIRE — The Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will present a program entirely of orchestral works, a program emphasizing vocal works and a program featuring piano with orchestra at its Berkshire Festival concerts this Friday and Saturday evening and next Sunday afternoon in the Music Shed at Tanglewood.

Soloists will include Jorge Bolet, pianist; Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Justino Diaz, bass, and Lili Chookasian, contralto.

KLEE THEMES — Richard Burgin, associate conductor, will conduct the concert of Friday evening which will feature "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee" by Gunther Schuller, currently acting head of the Department of Composition of the Berkshire Music Center.

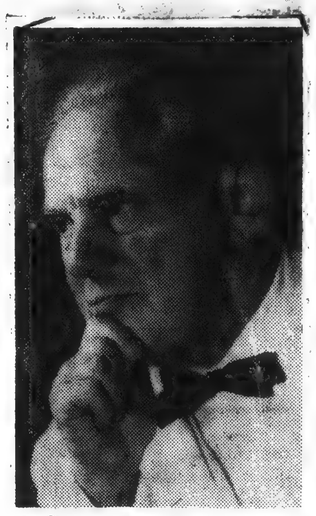
The concerts on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, conducted by Leinsdorf, will present works by Richard Strauss in the continuing observance of the composer's 100th anniversary and works which Leinsdorf has termed as Music for Festivals.

Jorge Bolet will give a piano recital at 8 Tuesday evening in the theater for the sixth chamber Music Concert of the season.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Republican (m)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 24,059

AUG 6 1964



RICHARD BURGIN, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and head of the Department of Instrumental Music at the Berkshire Music Center, will conduct the Boston Symphony tomorrow night at 8 o'clock in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

BOSTON HERALD 8/7/64

RICHARD BURGIN, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the symphony tonight at 8 p.m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. The program will include Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Opus 74.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ATHENS HERALD
Thursday, August 6, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

CAIRO HERALD
Thursday, August 6, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

GREENVILLE, N. Y.
LOCAL
W. 500

AUG 5 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 63,737 SUN. 116,166

AUG 2 1964
NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

DANBURY, CONN.
News-Times
Eve. Circ. 23,828

AUG 3 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 63,737 SUN. 116,166

AUG 2 1964
CAIRO, N. Y.
HERALD
W. 300

AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240

AUG 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193

AUG 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,427

AUG 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Town Times
OAKVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 2,382

JUL 30 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304

JUL 30 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397

AUG 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304

AUG 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,787

AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586

AUG 2 1964

Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132

AUG 6 1964

At Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will present a program entirely of orchestral works, a program emphasizing vocal works, and a program featuring piano with orchestra at its Berkshire Festival concerts this Friday and Saturday, Aug. 7-8, evenings and Sunday, Aug. 9, afternoon in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. Mr. Leinsdorf and Richard Burgin, associate conductor will conduct, and Tanglewood Soloists will include Jorge Bolet, pianist; Phyllis Curtin soprano; Justino Diaz, bass; and Lili Chookasian, contralto.

Mr. Burgin will conduct the concert of Friday evening, Aug. 7, 8 p.m. The first half of the program will consist of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, Op. 74, Pathetique. Following intermission Mr. Burgin will conduct the orchestra in Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee by Gunther Schuller, a first performance at Tanglewood. Mr. Schuller is currently acting head of the Department of Composition of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Burgin will close with Debussy's La Mer.

The concerts of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 8, 8 p.m.; Aug. 9, 2:30, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, will present works by Richard Strauss in the continuing observance of the composer's 100th anniversary, and works which Mr. Leinsdorf has termed as Music for Festivals. Saturday's program will open with The Ruins of Athens. Nachspiel Op. 113, by Beethoven, with Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Justino Diaz, bass; and the Festival Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon.

Sunday afternoon Mr. Leinsdorf will open the concert with the Symphonic Metamorphosis by Paul Hindemith, who died last fall. He will continue with Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D Minor, Op. 120. After intermission Jorge Bolet, pianist will join the orchestra for the first Tanglewood performance of Strauss' Parergon, for left hand alone, which has been performed only once before in this country, in 1934.

Mr. Bolet and the orchestra will close the program with Liszt's Fantasie on Themes from Ruins of Athens, of which Mr. Leinsdorf will have conducted the complete work the night before.

92

6TH WEEK AUGUST 3RD - 9TH

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111
AUG 6 1964

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL — TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. Friday at 8 p.m., Richard Burgin conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works by Tchaikovsky, Schuller and Debussy's "La Mer." Saturday at 10 a.m. the Open Rehearsal. Saturday at 8 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf conducts the BSO in Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," Strauss' "Three Hymns," and Menotti's "Death of the Bishop of Brindis." Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Liensdorf conducts the BSO in works by Hindemith, Schumann, Strauss and Liszt. At 8 p.m. Sunday the Festival of Contemporary American Music begins. Information call [illegible]

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
POUGHKEEPSIE JOURNAL
Sunday, August 2, 1964

Orchestra at Tanglewood Schedules Five New Works

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made known the program for next weekend at the Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Five works which have not been performed previously at the festival are included in the program, which features as soloists Jorge Bolet, pianist; Phyllis Curtin, soprano, Justino Diaz, bass, and Lili Chookasian, contralto.

Richard Burgin, associate conductor, will conduct Friday night's program which will include Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74, "Pathetique;" Gunther Schuller's "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee," a first performance, and Debussy's "La Mer."

The concerts at 8 o'clock Saturday night and 2:30 Sunday afternoon, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, will present works by Richard Strauss in the continuing observance of the composer's 100th anniversary, and works which Mr. Leinsdorf has termed as Music for Festivals. Saturday's program will open with "The Ruins of Athens," Op. 113, by Beethoven, with Phyllis Curtin, Mr. Diaz and the Festival Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon. Miss Curtin and Mr. Diaz are former members of the Berkshire Music Center. Miss Curtin will then return to sing "Three Hymns," Op. 71, by Strauss. The program will close with the eastern premiere of Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," with Miss Chookasian, Mr. Diaz and the Festival Chorus. All the works on this program will be first performances at Tanglewood.

Next Sunday afternoon Mr. Leinsdorf will open the concert with the Symphonic Metamorphosis by Paul Hindemith, who died last fall. He will continue with Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. [illegible] sion Mr. Bolet will join the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first performance of Strauss' "Parergon," for left hand alone, which has been performed only once before in this country, in 1934.

Mr. Bolet and the orchestra will close the program with Liszt's "Fantasie on Themes from 'Ruins of Athens,'" of which Mr. Leinsdorf will have conducted the complete work the night before.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 161,219 SUN. 304,523
AUG 2 1964

BERKSHIRE — The Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will present a program entirely of orchestral works, a program emphasizing vocal works and a program featuring piano with orchestra at its Berkshire Festival concerts this Friday and Saturday evening and next Sunday afternoon in the Music Shed at Tanglewood.

Soloists will include Jorge Bolet, pianist; Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Justino Diaz, bass, and Lili Chookasian, contralto.

KLEE THEMES — Richard Burgin, associate conductor, will conduct the concert of Friday evening which will feature "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee" by Gunther Schuller, currently acting head of the Department of Composition of the Berkshire Music Center.

The concerts on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, conducted by Leinsdorf, will present works by Richard Strauss in the continuing observance of the composer's 100th anniversary and works which Leinsdorf has termed as Music for Festivals.

Jorge Bolet will give a piano recital at 8 Tuesday evening in the theater for the sixth chamber Music Concert of the season.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Republican (m)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 24,059
AUG 6 1964

RICHARD BURGIN, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and head of the Department of Instrumental Music at the Berkshire Music Center, will conduct the Boston Symphony tomorrow night at 8 o'clock in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

BOSTON HERALD 8/7/64

RICHARD BURGIN, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the symphony tonight at 8 p.m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. The program will include Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Opus 74.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ATHENS HERALD
Thursday, August 6, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
CAIRO HERALD
Thursday, August 6, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
GREENVILLE LOCAL
Wednesday [illegible] 1964

GREENVILLE, N. Y.
LOCAL
W. 500
AUG 5 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106
AUG 2 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

DANBURY, CONN.
News-Times
Eve. Circ. 23,828
AUG 3 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106
AUG 2 1964

CAIRO, N. Y.
HERALD
W. 300
AUG 6 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
AUG 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
AUG 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,427
AUG 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Times
OAKVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 2,382
JUL 30 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
AUG 6 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
AUG 2 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,787
AUG 6 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586
AUG 2 1964

Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
AUG 6 1964

At Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will present a program entirely of orchestral works, a program emphasizing vocal works, and a program featuring piano with orchestra at its Berkshire Festival concerts this Friday and Saturday, Aug. 7-8, evenings and Sunday, Aug. 9, afternoon in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. Mr. Leinsdorf and Richard Burgin, associate conductor will conduct, and Tanglewood Soloists will include Jorge Bolet, pianist, Phyllis Curtin soprano; Justino Diaz, bass; and Lili Chookasian, contralto.

Mr. Burgin will conduct the concert of Friday evening, Aug. 7, 8 p.m. The first half of the program will consist of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, Op. 74, Pathetique. Following intermission Mr. Burgin will conduct the orchestra in Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee by Gunther Schuller, a first performance at Tanglewood. Mr. Schuller is currently acting head of the Department of Composition of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Burgin will close with Debussy's La Mer.

The concerts of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 8, 8 p.m.; Aug. 9, 2:30, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, will present works by Richard Strauss in the continuing observance of the composer's 100th anniversary, and works which Mr. Leinsdorf has termed as Music for Festivals. Saturday's program will open with The Ruins of Athens. Nachspiel Op. 113, by Beethoven, with Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Justino Diaz, bass; and the Festival Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon.

Sunday afternoon Mr. Leinsdorf will open the concert with the Symphonic Metamorphosis by Paul Hindemith, who died last fall. He will continue with Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D Minor, Op. 120. After intermission Jorge Bolet, pianist will join the orchestra for the first Tanglewood performance of Strauss' Parergon, for left hand alone, which has been performed only once before in this country, in 1934.

Mr. Bolet and the orchestra will close the program with Liszt's Fantasie on Themes from Ruins of Athens, of which Mr. Leinsdorf will have conducted the complete work the night before.

TIGHT BINDING

REVIEWS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105

Menotti Cantata on Tanglewood Program

"The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," a cantata about a figure in the Children's Crusade, will have its east coast premiere at the Berkshire Festival Saturday evening in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. Soloists in the new work by Gian Carlo Menotti will be Lili Chookasian, contralto, and Justino Diaz, bass, assisted by the Festival Chorus. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony.

The programs this weekend, Friday and Saturday at 8 and Sunday at 2:30, will feature, respectively, orchestral works, vocal works and music for piano with orchestra.

Richard Burgin will conduct the concert of Friday evening. The first half of the program will consist of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74, "Pathetique." Following intermission is Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee by Gunther Schuller, a first performance at Tanglewood. Schuller is currently acting head of the Department of Composition of the Berkshire Music Center. Burgin will close the concert with Debussy's "La Mer."

The concerts of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon conducted by Leinsdorf, will present works by Richard Strauss in the continuing observance of the composer's 100th anniversary, and works which Leinsdorf has termed as music for festivals. Saturday's program will open with "The Ruins of Athens," Nachspiel, Op. 113, by Beethoven, with Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Justino Diaz, bass; and the Festival Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon. Miss Curtin and Mr. Diaz are both former members of the Berkshire Music Center. Miss Curtin will then return to sing "These Hymns," Op. 71 by Strauss. The program will close with the eastern premiere of Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi."

All the works on this program will be first performances at Tanglewood.

Sunday afternoon Leinsdorf will open the concert with the Symphonic Metamorphosis by Paul Hindemith, who died in December. He will continue with Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120. After intermission Jorge Bolet, pianist, will join the orchestra for the first Tanglewood performance of Straus "Parergon," for left hand alone, with has been performed only once before in this country, in 1934. Bolet and the orchestra will close the program with Liszt's Fantasia on Themes from "Ruins of Athens," of which Leinsdorf will have conducted the complete work the night before.

Jorge Bolet will also give a piano recital this coming Tuesday evening, Aug. 4, for the sixth Chamber Music Concert of the season, at 8 p.m. in the Theater. His program will consist of the Sonata in A flat, Op. 110, by Beethoven, and Liszt's Twelve Etudes d'Execution Transcendante, which the composer wrote and revised over a period of years to demonstrate his own technical brilliance at the piano. Proceeds from the Tuesday evening Chamber Music Concerts benefit the Berkshire Music Center's Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund.

This afternoon at 2:30, Leinsdorf will conduct a program of Dvorak's Symphony No. 6; Bartok's Violin Concerto No. 2, with Joseph Silverstein as soloist; and the Prelude and Waltz Sequence from "Der Rosenkavalier" by Strauss.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
AUG 13 1964

TANGLEWOOD WEEKEND

Friday Evening
By J.G.B.

Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the orchestra, led his former colleagues in two of the BSO's most famous showpieces, the Tchaikovsky Pathetique Symphony and Debussy's La Mer. Between these two classics stood Gunther Schuller's Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee, conducted by the composer.

The program thus offered satisfaction to the traditionalists, and caviar to the avant-garde, and, judging from the audience reaction, both groups came away well-pleased.

Mr. Burgin has the advantage of being able to draw his conceptions from years of experience under a series of great conductors; he clearly knows the music inside out. In both the Tchaikovsky and the Debussy his performance was broadly spaced and massive.

He did not, for example, take the famous march movement of the symphony at the lickety-split tempo affected by some virtuoso conductors; here as elsewhere one was able to perceive details one had never heard before, an unusual experience in the case of such familiar works.

The Schuller Seven Studies is clever, ingenious, amusing, and not, one suspects, very profound. Many of us had never before heard jazz at Tanglewood, nor had we heard "authentic Arab folk material" for all we could tell, authentically performed.

Saturday Evening
By A. C. Sly

Phyllis Curtin and Lili Chookasian, sopranos, and Justino Diaz, bass, were soloists in a most unusual program directed by Erich Leinsdorf. The music was not familiar, with one exception, and credit is due the conductor for continuing to break from the "tried and true" tradition that has prevailed for so many years.

The one familiar piece was the Turkish march, part of Beethoven's Ruins of Athens. The complete work, presented tonight, is light-hearted and humorous, and includes a chorus for male voices singing nonsense syllables. Miss Curtin and Mr. Diaz were in excellent voice, and the performance was full of vitality.

Miss Curtin had a more demanding role in Three Hymns of Friedrich Holderlin, by Strauss. Although the composer asks much of the soloist, the score is not inspired. It quickly discards any approach to inventiveness in favor of the composer's routine cliches.

Gian Carlo Menotti was on hand to acknowledge applause for his recent (1963) work, The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi. The subject matter is dramatic and Menotti has taken advantage of it to create a score with immediate appeal.

Mr. Diaz as the bishop, Miss Chookasian as a nun, the Festival Chorus, and a children's chorus (made up of young campers from the area) gave a most effective presentation.

Sunday Afternoon
By C.D.

Sunday afternoon's concert at Tanglewood continued the offerings of seldom-heard music. Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber opened the program. This is not profound music, but the Scherzo with its skillful writing for percussion instruments is a delightful bit of fluff.

Schumann's Symphony No. 4 is important on paper, because it pointed the way to the symphonic poem and the cyclical form, but it is dull Schumann full of endless sequences — dull except for one magical passage at the end of the Romanze, which recalled the romantic Schumann at his best.

After the intermission Jorge Bolet dominated the second half of the program. He is a pianist of extraordinary brilliance, and he had two vehicles with which to show off that brilliance. The Parergon to the Sinfonia Domestica for Piano and Orchestra of Richard Strauss was written for the left hand alone, and in addition to providing a great technical display on the part of the pianist provides some voluptuous orchestral sounds in the best Strauss tradition.

As if this were not enough, Mr. Bolet continued the program with the Liszt Fantasia on Beethoven's Ruins of Athens. This is old-fashioned bravura music with which the virtuosi of the 19th Century wowed their audiences. In the hands of a super technician like Bolet it can even how wow an audience, and as this writer left the hall, the pianist was still returning for bows and bravos and cheers.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499
AUG 12 1964

Burgin Conducts At Tanglewood

The sixth weekend of concerts at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stressing director Leinsdorf's promised "Music for Festivals," started Friday evening with associate conductor and former concertmaster, Richard Burgin, assuming the podium for a beautifully performed and popular program.

It included Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, the sensuous "Pathetique," a first appearance of Gunther Schuller's "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee," which some felt were not worthy of BSO, but which delighted and bewildered many listeners with their varied relationships to the artist's pictures, "some relate to the actual design, shape or color scheme . . . others take the general mood . . . as a point of departure . . . no artist whose work bears such a close relationship to music . . ." these quotes are the composer's stated intentions. Debussy himself would probably have approved Mr. Burgin's sensitive, yet impassioned interpretation of his "La Mer," closing an evening of musical and weather perfect enjoyment.

For Saturday's program Mr. Leinsdorf chose three first performances, among them Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," by far the most outstanding. Written in 1963 for the Cincinnati Music Association, Mr. Menotti took his text from the Children's Crusade of 1212, because he "blessed the children to their doom," and the final "blinding answer" to his questioning mind. As the nun and bishop, Lili Chookasian and Jusfino Diaz were commendable, Mr. Diaz having a perfectly placed bass voice lacking convincing dramatic intensity. The Festival Chorus prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon, were amazingly and clearly eclipsed by the children's chorus, comprised from eight camps adjacent to Tanglewood, remarkably trained by James Cunningham to a smoothly articulate projection, appealing in part because of their youthfulness. An added wonder was the excellent integration accomplished by Mr. Leinsdorf, perhaps the largest assemblage ever onstage.

The first half of the program featured soprano Phyllis Curtin, gowned in exquisitely draped chartreuse chiffon, in seldom heard and perhaps thankfully, Beethoven's "The Ruins of Athens" and "Three Hymns of Friedrich Holderlin" by Strauss. Justino Diaz joined Miss Curtin in the Beethoven, along with the well trained Tanglewood Chorus. The work seemed to be lacking in life, however, despite the individually notable efforts of orchestra and vocalists in all movements. We must admit the everlasting charm of the Chorus of Dervishes and Marcia alla Turca. Pleasant, but not particularly moving were the three hymns. Miss Curtin's voice equal to every demand, although occasionally more sharpness of pitch would have been desirable.

At the close of the concert, Mr. Leinsdorf brought Miss de-Varon, Mr. Menotti, Mr. Thompson, on stage to acknowledge the tumultuous applause from a noticeably smaller audience than Friday's concert.

Sunday's program included the always intriging and definitive Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carla Maria von Weber by Hindemith, clearly outlined by Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra. Schomann's fourth Symphony in D minor, repetitious, romantic, although rather dry in this performance completed the first half.

Cuban-born Jorge Bolet, noted pianist, played with apparent and astounding technical facility, two first performances at Tanglewood, Straus' "Parergon to the Sinfonia Domestica, Op 73" and Listzt's Fantasia on Themes from Beethoven's "The Ruins of Athens," both for piano and orchestra, the former commissioned by a prominent Austrian pianist, Paul Wittgenstein, who lost his right arm in World War I, thereafter developing an independent left-hand technique. Again the audience numbered about 6,000 but its enthusiasm made up for its size, recalling performers many times.—M. deBB.

TIGHT BINDING

REVIEWS

13

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105
AUG 2 1964

Menotti Cantata on Tanglewood Program

"The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," a cantata about a figure in the Children's Crusade, will have its east coast premiere at the Berkshire Festival Saturday evening in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. Soloists in the new work by Gian Carlo Menotti will be Lili Chookasian, contralto, and Justino Diaz, bass, assisted by the Festival Chorus. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony.

The programs this weekend, Friday and Saturday at 8 and Sunday at 2:30, will feature, respectively, orchestral works, vocal works and music for piano with orchestra.

Richard Burgin will conduct the concert of Friday evening. The first half of the program will consist of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74, "Pathetique." Following intermission is Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee by Gunther Schuller, a first performance at Tanglewood. Schuller is currently acting head of the Department of Composition of the Berkshire Music Center. Burgin will close the concert with Debussy's "La Mer."

The concerts of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon conducted by Leinsdorf, will present works by Richard Strauss in the continuing observance of the composer's 100th anniversary, and works which Leinsdorf has termed as music for festivals. Saturday's program will open with "The Ruins of Athens," Nachspiel, Op. 113, by Beethoven, with Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Justino Diaz, bass; and the Festival Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon. Miss Curtin and Mr. Diaz are both former members of the Berkshire Music Center. Miss Curtin will then return to sing "These Hymns," Op. 71 by Strauss. The program will close with the eastern premiere of Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi."

All the works on this program will be first performances at Tanglewood.

Sunday afternoon Leinsdorf will open the concert with the Symphonic Metamorphosis by Paul Hindemith, who died in December. He will continue with Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120. After intermission Jorge Bolet, pianist, will join the orchestra for the first Tanglewood performance of Strauss' "Parergon," for left hand alone, with has been performed only once before in this country, in 1934. Bolet and the orchestra will close the program with Liszt's Fantasia on Themes from "Ruins of Athens," of which Leinsdorf will have conducted the complete work the night before.

Jorge Bolet will also give a piano recital this coming Tuesday evening, Aug. 4, for the sixth Chamber Music Concert of the season, at 8 p.m. in the Theater. His program will consist of the Sonata in A flat Op. 110, by Beethoven, and Liszt's Twelve Etudes d'Execution Transcendante, which the composer wrote and revised over a period of years to demonstrate his own technical brilliance at the piano. Proceeds from the Tuesday evening Chamber Music Concerts benefit the Berkshire Music Center's Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund.

This afternoon at 2:30, Leinsdorf will conduct a program of Dvorak's Symphony No. 6; Bartok's Violin Concerto No. 2, with Joseph Silverstein as soloist; and the Prelude and Waltz Sequence from "Der Rosenkavalier" by Strauss.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
AUG 13 1964

TANGLEWOOD WEEKEND

Friday Evening
By J.G.B.

Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the orchestra, led his former colleagues in two of the BSO's most famous showpieces, the Tchaikovsky Pathetique Symphony and Debussy's La Mer. Between these two classics stood Gunther Schuller's Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee, conducted by the composer.

The program thus offered satisfaction to the traditionalists, and caviar to the avant-garde, and, judging from the audience reaction, both groups came away well-pleased.

Mr. Burgin has the advantage of being able to draw his conceptions from years of experience under a series of great conductors; he clearly knows the music inside out. In both the Tchaikovsky and the Debussy his performance was broadly spaced and massive.

He did not, for example, take the famous march movement of the symphony at the lickety-split tempo affected by some virtuoso conductors; here as elsewhere one was able to perceive details one had never heard before, an unusual experience in the case of such familiar works.

The Schuller Seven Studies is clever, ingenious, amusing, and not, one suspects, very profound. Many of us had never before heard jazz at Tanglewood, nor had we heard "authentic Arab folk material" for all we could tell, authentically performed.

Saturday Evening
By A. C. Sly

Phyllis Curtin and Lili Chookasian, sopranos, and Justino Diaz, bass, were soloists in a most unusual program, directed by Erich Leinsdorf. The music was not familiar, with one exception, and credit is due the conductor for continuing to break from the "tried and true" tradition that has prevailed for so many years.

The one familiar piece was the Turkish march, part of Beethoven's Ruins of Athens. The complete work, presented tonight, is light-hearted and humorous, and includes a chorus for male voices singing nonsense syllables. Miss Curtin and Mr. Diaz were in excellent voice, and the performance was full of vitality.

Miss Curtin had a more demanding role in Three Hymns of Friedrich Holderlin, by Strauss. Although the composer asks much of the soloist, the score is not inspired. It quickly discards any approach to inventiveness in favor of the composer's routine cliches.

Gian Carlo Menotti was on hand to acknowledge applause for his recent (1963) work, The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi. The subject matter is dramatic and Menotti has taken advantage of it to create a score with immediate appeal.

Mr. Diaz as the bishop, Miss Chookasian as a nun, the Festival Chorus, and a children's chorus (made up of young campers from the area) gave a most effective presentation.

Sunday Afternoon
By C.D.

Sunday afternoon's concert at Tanglewood continued the offerings of seldom-heard music. Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber opened the program. This is not profound music, but the Scherzo with its skillful writing for percussion instruments is a delightful bit of fluff.

Schumann's Symphony No. 4 is important on paper, because it pointed the way to the symphonic poem and the cyclical form, but it is dull Schumann full of endless sequences — dull except for one magical passage at the end of the Romanze, which recalled the romantic Schumann at his best.

After the intermission Jorge Bolet dominated the second half of the program. He is a pianist of extraordinary brilliance, and he had two vehicles with which to show off that brilliance. The Parergon to the Sinfonia Domestica for Piano and Orchestra of Richard Strauss was written for the left hand alone, and in addition to providing a great technical display on the part of the pianist provides some voluptuous orchestral sounds in the best Strauss tradition.

As if this were not enough, Mr. Bolet continued the program with the Liszt Fantasia on Beethoven's Ruins of Athens. This is old-fashioned bravura music with which the virtuosi of the 19th Century wowed their audiences. In the hands of a super technician like Bolet it can even now wow an audience, and as this writer left the hall, the pianist was still returning for bows and bravos and cheers.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499
AUG 12 1964

Burgin Conducts At Tanglewood

The sixth weekend of concerts at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stressing director Leinsdorf's promised "Music for Festivals," started Friday evening with associate conductor and former concertmaster Richard Burgin, assuming the podium for a beautifully performed and popular program.

It included Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, the sensuous "Pathetique," a first appearance of Gunther Schuller's "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee," which some felt were not worthy of BSO, but which delighted and bewildered many listeners with their varied relationships to the artist's pictures, "some relate to the actual design, shape or color scheme . . . others take the general mood . . . as a point of departure . . . no artist whose work bears such a close relationship to music . . ," these quotes are the composer's stated intentions. Debussy himself would probably have approved Mr. Burgin's sensitive, yet impassioned interpretation of his "La Mer," closing an evening of musical and weather perfect enjoyment.

For Saturday's program Mr. Leinsdorf chose three first performances, among them Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," by far the most outstanding. Written in 1963 for the Cincinnati Music Association, Mr. Menotti took his text from the Children's Crusade of 1212, because he "blessed the children, to their doom," and the final "blinding answer" to his questioning mind. As the nun and bishop, Lili Chookasian and Justino Diaz were commendable, Mr. Diaz having a perfectly placed bass voice, but lacking convincing dramatic intensity. The Festival Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon, were amazingly and clearly eclipsed by the children's chorus, comprised from eight camps adjacent to Tanglewood, remarkably trained by James Cunningham to a smoothly articulate projection, appealing in part because of their youthfulness. An added wonder was the excellent integration accomplished by Mr. Leinsdorf, perhaps the largest assemblage ever onstage.

The first half of the program featured soprano Phyllis Curtin, gowned in exquisitely draped chartreuse chiffon, in seldom heard and perhaps thankfully, Beethoven's "The Ruins of Athens" and "Three Hymns of Friedrich Holderlin" by Strauss. Justino Diaz joined Miss Curtin in the Beethoven, along with the well trained Tanglewood Chorus. The work seemed to be lacking in life, however, despite the individually notable efforts of orchestra and vocalists in all movements. We must admit the everlasting charm of the Chorus of Dervishes and Marcia alla Turca. Pleasant, but not particularly moving were the three hymns, Miss Curtin's voice equal to every demand, although occasionally more sharpness of pitch would have been desirable.

At the close of the concert Mr. Leinsdorf brought Miss de Varon, Mr. Menotti, Mr. Thompson, on stage to acknowledge the tumultuous applause from a noticeably smaller audience than Friday's concert.

Sunday's program included the always intriging and definitive Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carla Maria von Weber by Hindemith, clearly outlined by Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra. Schomann's fourth Symphony in D minor, repetitious, romantic, although rather dry in this performance completed the first half.

Cuban-born Jorge Bolet, noted pianist, played with apparent and astounding technical facility, two first performances at Tanglewood, Straus' "Parergon to the Sinfonia Domestica, Op. 73" and Listzt's Fantasia on Themes from Beethoven's "The Ruins of Athens," both for [illegible] and orchestra, the former commissioned by a prominent Austrian pianist, Paul Wittgenstein, who lost his right arm in World War I, thereafter developing an independent left-hand technique. Again the audience numbered about 6,000 but its enthusiasm made up for its size, recalling performers many times. M. [illegible]

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,427
AUG 10 1964

Boston Symphony In Performance With Novelty Flavor At Tanglewood

The Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra held at Tanglewood over the weekend were well flavored with novelty — six of the ten compositions performed at the three concerts had not previously been performed there.

Friday night's concert which was conducted by Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony and concertmaster until his retirement in 1962, included Tchaikovsky's Symphony Number 6 in B Minor "Pathetique"; the first Festival performance of Schuller's "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee; and "La Mer", Three Symphonic Sketches, by Debussy.

The Schuller struck quite a note of novelty placed as it was between the other two works, in fact it came as quite a shock. Interpretations of paintings are always open to controversy anyway but if one agreed with what Schuller had to say about Klee in musical terms, there should have been no trouble enjoying the performance.

Under Mr. Burgin's baton, however, one hears not so much the reflection of the conductor in the performance as the Boston Symphony itself, playing its own interpretation of the scores.

The Saturday evening concert conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, was comprised of three works, none of which had been performed at Tanglewood before. The theatrical "Ruins of Athens" by Beethoven featured the festival chorus prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon with Phyllis Curtin as soprano and Justino Diaz as bass. Miss Curtin who sang only a brief duet in this work was the soloist in the next composition on the program, Richard Strauss' "Three Hymns of Friedrich Holderlin, Op. 71." The three songs are set against an elaborate orchestral background which is typical of the composer, though a bit long-winded.

Gian Carlo Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" was admirably performed by orchestra and chorus alike. This cantata, one of Menotti's most appealing scores, is somewhat sentimental but goes well with the theme of the bishop's regret for blessing the children who embarked on the Children's Crusade in the 12th century.

Sunday afternoon's program was made up of Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria van Weber; Schumann's Fourth Symphony and two works from orchestral scores by Strauss and Liszt. In all cases the orchestra showed its virtuosity and Jorge Bolet, soloist in the Liszt "Fantasia on Themes from Beethoven's 'The Ruins of Athens," offered an exciting and stimulating performance.

The weekend attendance was slightly below average being tabulated at 20,000. Cool weather and perhaps a bit too much novelty might have been to blame. Nevertheless, once more Leinsdorf has provided the dash and excitement which has been responsible for the enthusiastic reception of the famous summer concerts.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
AUG 8 1964

At Tanglewood

Composer Conducts Seven Studies on Klee

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

LENOX—The current weekend of Boston Symphony concerts at Tanglewood was opened by Richard Burgin, the orchestra's associate conductor.

He led Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony and Debussy's "La Mer." Between the two came Gunther Schuller's "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee" which Leinsdorf had conducted in Boston late last season and which this time was directed by the composer himself.

I find I can more easily accept Schuller's pieces as illustrations of their titles than of the Klee pictures that bear the same titles and to which, of course, they are intended to be related. The more abstract ones come closer to suggesting Klee, the others, uncomfortably close sometimes to Arthur Fiedler's Springtime repertory of syncopated clocks, musical typewriters and swatted mosquitoes.

They do not wear really well, and for the obvious reason that they are musically very slim. "Abstraction," for groups of instrumental trios, seems the only musical achievement in the set of much solidity. The rest hardly gets off the level of diverting detail, though much of that is quite charmingly invented.

It was a revelation and a pleasure to hear the "Seven Studies" in the composer's own performance, an achievement in interpretation and execution that was very far ahead of other readings I have heard. For "Arabian Town" and "Pastorale" he found far better tempi than had Leinsdorf, and the other pieces, notably the jazzy "Little Blue Devil" and the Pointillist "Twittering Machine," benefitted immensely from the composer's own strong feeling for and belief in their idiom.

The "Seven Studies" provide lots of nice opportunities for the orchestra and for orchestral soloists. Jazz still comes just a little stickily for some of the players, but otherwise things went very nicely indeed, especially the sinuous Middle-Eastern flute solo played off stage by Mr. Pappoutsakis.

What can one say about Mr. Burgin? He is what one calls a "solid musician," a man of experience and competence, commendably free of charlatanry and other symptoms of conductural megalomania.

It is not often given to him to make magic. He is rhythmically a heavy and rather inflexible conductor. His left hand knoweth entirely too well what his right hand is doing, for it almost all the time is doing the same thing. This means that his actual conducting consists of almost nothing but beat. All those downbeats coming in duplicate make progress awfully heavily. Also, Burgin did not help matters by turning of the measures in the march of the Tchaikovsky symphony from 12/8 into 6/8, that is, conducting them as though there were twice as many barlines, and thus twice as many accents. It was mainly the heavy accentuation that kept a very honest reading from getting off the ground.

As for "La Mer," we got little more than a rough reminder of how the piece goes. The piece was played almost as though Debussy hadn't anywhere put a dynamic or phrasing indication into his score. What was not out-and-out wrong in these areas was at least crude, and I was surprised and disappointed that Burgin and the Boston Symphony could not between them come closer to giving a decent "La Mer."

Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384
AUG 9 1964

Schuller's Studies From Klee Steal the Show at Tanglewood

By Eric Salzman
LENOX, Mass.

The Berkshire Hills had symphonic studies, symphonic sketches and not-so-symphonic symphony Friday night.

The symphony was the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique," the sketches, the three moments that make up Debussy's "La Mer"; both compositions under the direction of the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, Richard Burgin. The studies were Gunther Schuller's set of seven "On Themes of Paul Klee" and it was the studies that stole the show.

Schuller is the acting head of the composition department here this summer and the musical entrepreneur of a Tanglewood contemporary music series of which more will be heard from later. His Klee pieces, each after a picture by the Swiss painter, are a series of orchestral and imaginative tours de force of an extraordinary virtuosity.

These pieces make no pretense at any kind of overall musical coherence or consistency. Each is an idea, a find, an invention.

"The Twittering Machine" twitters (bloop-bleep serial fashion), "The Arabian Town" wails Arabically (even to the most exquisite out-of-tune eastern instrumental ensemble), "The Little Blue Devil" does his dirty work in a low-down jazz beat, the "Antique Harmonies" are pile-ups of fifths and the "Abstract Trio" is a most effective piece of chromatic orchestral chamber music. Perhaps the most musically remarkable sections are the "Abstract Trio" and the final two sections, a brief "Eerie Moment" and a final undulating "Pastoral."

The piece seems to have something for every one. It goes as a serious piece of work and yet it makes its impression immediately on almost everybody. It doesn't hang together and its a big bag of tricks but, frankly, nothing in its class has been written in years.

The piece makes it almost on the sheer weight of Schuller's musicality and musical authority. Friday night's performance by the Boston Symphony had the extra advantage of being conducted by the composer himself. It is said that it had only some 45 minutes of rehearsal. That it went so well was a tribute to the men as well as to Schuller's conducting skill and the precise brilliance of his orchestral imagination.

The orchestra played well, not only for Schuller, but also for Mr. Burgn, their former concertmaster. The Tchaikovsky was never strained, never coy, never agonized indeed, it was casual in a beautiful sort of way. The result was a kind of straightforward richness that was not inappropriate for the piece.

The reading of the Debussy was similarly controlled and gorgeous, if never profound—this is a piece that (if the maritime pun can be pardoned) has depths, but a great deal can be done on the surface. The Boston, even in its summertime version, is a great orchestra, and they responded to Mr. Burgin's direction with all the color vitality and effective motion that could be drawn out of this kind of performance.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785
AUG 9 196-

Music: Inspired by Klee

Schuller Conducts His 'Seven Studies,' Based on Artist's Themes, at Lenox

By RAYMOND ERICSON
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 8—Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years, led last night his only program of the current Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

No longer the concertmaster of the orchestra, he divides his winters between Boston and a teaching post in Florida, and in the summer he stays put at Tanglewood as teacher of violin, chamber music and conducting at the Berkshire Music Center.

Mr. Burgin opened the program with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony and closed with Debussy's "La Mer," specialties of the Boston ensemble.

In between came the festival's first performance of Gunther Schuller's "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee," conducted by Mr. Schuller, who is acting head of the center's composition department this season.

●

The performance of the Tchaikovsky symphony was a model in almost every way except spirit. Mr. Burgin conducted it in a strong, sensible fashion that slighted nothing in the score. The phrases were firmly molded, the orchestral tone was solid and full, with all the main and subsidiary themes brought out, and there was excitement as tempos were whipped up at climatic points. But the conductor did not allow the excitement to run away with him. It was a firm, controlled, healthy version of a score that drained much of the symphony's mystery and affecting melancholia.

The Debussy went better, although this, too, was a case of a symphonic landscape having too bright and prosaic a light thrown on it. Mr. Burgin's somewhat matter-of-fact tempos, steady and a shade brusque, dissipated the magic in music that is often flickering and full of light and shade. At the same time, the virtuosic playing of the Bostonians in this and the Tchaikovsky makes any of their performances almost irresistible.

So it was the Schuller novelty that gave the evening a fillip. This work, first performed in 1959 when the composer was 34 years old, carries a certain irony, since it is exactly what the title says it is. Mr. Schuller, like many a programatic and romantic composer, has tried to turn pictorial images into musical ones, and in his remarks about the work he writes of "the brighter yellow of the trumpets and high strings."

This does not affect the worth of the music, and to some extent it makes the music, which is up to date in its dissonance and occasional use of serial techniques, quite accessible to the audience.

Above all, the work is beautifully scored because the composer has such a sensitive ear for delicate, precise sonorities, as in the evocation of "Arab Village." It is also witty, as it makes use of a blues style in "Little Blue Devil" and of twittering winds and strings for "The Twittering Machine."

●

The individual musical pictures are as succinct and sure in touch as the Klees that inspired them, and the total must be accounted among the most attractive of contemporary American works.

Mr. Schuller won a delightful performance from the Boston Symphony. It had precision, clarity and atmosphere. The work was a success with the audience, evoking laughter at times and applause after each section. At the end the composer was recalled several times for bows. The orchestra members, too, seemed to share in the enthusiasm for the piece.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193

Burgin Brings Sonic Splendor With Conducting

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—It was an evening of sonic splendor in the shed at Tanglewood Friday night, and 5283 were there to hear it.

Opens With Tchaikovsky

Richard Burgin, associate conductor, pulled out all the stops for excitement as he opened the program with Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony. As he closed it with Debussy's "La Mer," he let the sound engulf the audience in great undulating waves.

In between those sound spectaculars the orchestra was conducted by Gunter Schuller, acting head of the department of composition in the Berkshire Music Center, for a performance of his own "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee."

When he wrote it for performance in 1959 by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, he said "each of the seven pieces bears a slightly different relationship to the original Klee picture from which it stems. Some relate to the actual design, shape or color scheme of the painting, while others take the general mood of the picture or its title as a point of departure."

Atonal Systems

The music is founded largely on the atonal systems common to contemporary serial music, seldom using the whole, or even very many members, of the orchestra at one time and exploits the versatility and widely varying tonal characteristics available in a fully staffed symphony orchestra.

The audience at first seemed somewhat mystified by the eccentric tonal combinations and asymetrical rhythms, but murmurs of interest began to rise during the third "study" a short piece called "Little Blue Devil" which is full of jazz rhythms and hot horn melodies.

During the fourth, "The Twittering Machine," there was unconcealed laughter, a circumstance that must have given the composer much joy because the piece really is funny, and concert audiences often are on their best, polite behavior and do not laugh at serious-funny music.

There was much approval, also of the fifth piece, "Arab Village," a work characterized by shimmering strings behind acrid, Near-Eastern melodies wailed by the flute and oboe.

The solid applause given Schuller's contemporary music indicated a degree of approval that was nearly as surprising as some of the twists and turns in the music.

Burgin opened the program with a Tchaikovsky Sixth Symphony that was frankly flamboyant. It was magnificent and sumptuous. It was so lavish in its sound effects it seemed, sometimes, to wallow in its own luxury.

If this seems to condemn with kindness, let the reader be not misled. Tchaikovsky's symphonies can stand an almost unlimited amount of lavishness. That is what they are.

Burgin opened the first few bars very, very slowly and built the volume as he increased the pace to a shattering climax. The rest of the symphony was handled with the same kind of benevolence.

The emphasis was on spaciousness and sound effects; big brass and big drums were encouraged and close attention was paid to contrasts of mood and excitement.

Tchaikovsky's melodies were pretty much left to shift for themselves, which worked out all right because his melodies were pretty much left to shift for themselves, which worked out all right because his melodies are so strong and inherently beautiful they seem to play themselves without help.

The Debussy was given a fairly standard portrayal with, perhaps, an extra slowness of space apparently intended, with success to establish a feeling of the great open space one sees and feels at the seashore.

Burgin's normally slightly slow tempos worked well for him Friday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451
AUG 8 1964

Music:

Richard Burgin At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — It's a question whether magnificence or mediocrity made the greater impact on last night's Berkshire Music Festival audience at Tanglewood.

This was the opening concert of the festival's sixth weekend, attended by 5,283. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was led by Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the orchestra and retired concert master.

The program was Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, Opus 74; Gunther Schuller's Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee; and Debussy's "La Mer."

Berkshire Music Faculty

Schuller is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center this summer, as he was last. The center is the educational department of the Boston Symphony. It has been the policy to include on the festival programs works by the composer-teachers in residence. Some years this has been fortunate — Jacques Ibert, Darius Milhaud, Olivier Messiaen.

Burgin and the orchestra gave themselves whole-heartedly to the Tchaikovsky symphony. One could say that they were more interested in the composer than what is normally expected of the sixth. For one thing, tempos were uncommonly slow—except at points of crisis.

A moderate tempo almost transformed the graceful second movement into a barcarole, and the finale was magnificently conducted and played. Burgin brought out inner voices that usually get drowned. It was like looking behind the scenes.

Lucid, Explicit, Detailed

Schuller conducted his "Seven Studies." He was lucid, explicit and detailed — seemed to mark measure bars with shoulder motions. There are always professional and amateur rooters for a new cause. Because of these, Schuller may feel that his work was a success.

Inspiration and excuse for this music is seven works by the Swiss painter Klee, who lived from 1879 to 1940. The music purportedly reflects the pictorial obvious. "Little Blue Devil" is a lamenting, jazzy pixy: "Twittering Machine" twitters; "Arab Village" has oriental, winding melody.

Synonymous Tonal Hues

But Schuller also tries to tell the idea that Klee's colors and his own tonal hues are synonymous. So, in "Antique Harmonies" the trumpets are "bright yellow" — in "Abstract Trio" it's the woodinds' turn to be bright, while the muted brass is "grainier." And in "Pastoral," the clarinet, French horn and English horn are "pastoral' in quality.

None of this negative theorizing would detract if the music sounded well, no matter what it meant.

"Antique Harmonies" and "Abstract Trio" had murky harmonies over silly tunes traipsed in woodwinds and occasionally squawking chords "But Devil" gave nothing to grasp but a jaunty jazz rhythm in background. "Twittering is a gossipy affair with Mexican jumping bean action".

Work's Oasis

The "Arabian Town" is the work's oasis. The flute plays a charming melody. Drum beats and oboe are effective mood abetters. "Eerie Moment" creates tension with near silence, broken by two violent outbursts of clapping thunder. Then the calm unmercifully returns.

"Lamer's" traditional style was followed — tempos designed for mediation and clear tonal pictures of the three scenes. Outstanding features, however, were the finesse of tonal coloring and discipline in implanting solos over sound tapestries.

Tonight, Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony in Beethoven' dramatice piece, "The Ruins of Athens," Opus 113, with the festival chorus. Phyllis Curtin, soprano, and Justino Diaz, bass. Miss Curtin will be heard in Richard Strauss' "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" with childrens and adult chorus, Diaz, and Lili Chookasian, soprano.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
AUG 10 1964

Concert Review

Tchaikovsky, Schuller Menotti at Tanglewood

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened this weekend's concerts with Tchaikovsky's emotionally luxuriant "Pathetique."

Though immoderate is perhaps too strong a term for the work over which the composer shed warm tears, a listener is still likely too conscious of the work's emotion to completely admire the music's grace. Whether it be our maturity or this age of anxiety, the mere suggestion of saline emotion seems an indulgence.

Promoted No Flood

Mr. Burgin's conservative reading promoted no flood, but there were moments when the auditor was reminded of his own youth and of the symphony's specialist, Serge Koussevitsky; how easy was sentiment then to come by and how lush was it to bathe in.

Gunther Schullers' Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee, by immediate contrast, seemed arid. Carefully conducted by the composer, the pieces were, nevertheless, amusing, pleasant and sparkling reflections of Klee's work. The playful pointillistic sounds were a marvelous example of music's trend towards the graphic and should one, by the way, turn to the artist Paul Klee, he could find an equally fine example of art's trend towards the abstract.

The caricature of jazz used for Klee's "Little Blue Devil" with its abbreiviated "Blues" carried a swift though limited expression. "The Arab Village" was painted with too wide a musical brush to match the razor-sharp impression of the original, or highly entertain the intellect. But "The Twittering Machine," "Pastorale" and especially "Antique Harmonies" produced fine discrete impressions. Mr. Schuller may, like Strauss, Mahler and many others, long regret his program notes. Music may be weakened by libretto, but a composer's written translations can, and quite frequently do advance the untimely demise of many works.

Sang Well

On the other hand, Menotti's "Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" seemed a re-interment. The adult chorus of citizens sang well, the children's chorus was on key, bass Justino Diaz' voice was marvelous despite its siz and the Nun, Lilli Chookasian was in top form.

The only part that failed wa the music which, bolstered by Berlioz, Strauss, Stravinsky an Haydn, contributed an almos stereotype accompaniment t Menotti's naive libretto.

Menotti has a proven flair fo the dramatic in such operas as; "The Medium," "The Consul," and organization in such treacles as "Amahl" or satire in "Amelia" etc. But should all this music be stripped of its theatrical rainment, the effect might likely appear immodest. The Bishop's death is, by and large, slow and painful.

Phyllis Curtin wrestled valiantly and honorably with Strauss' Three Hymns to love and homeland, but what even this magnificent voice could not produce was a balanced result to the BSO's weight and the composer's over-blown orchestration.

The weekend's concerts closed Sunday with works by Liszt, Strauss, Schumann and Hindemith. The Hindemith was a delightfully clear portrayal of the composer's 1943 Symphonic Metamorphosis of themes by Carl Maria von Weber. Though there is little Hindemith either implies or intends in his music that could be construed as something of stirring warmth, this brilliant work needs no apologies. One need lend but his intellect with his ear to be heartwarmed by this work.

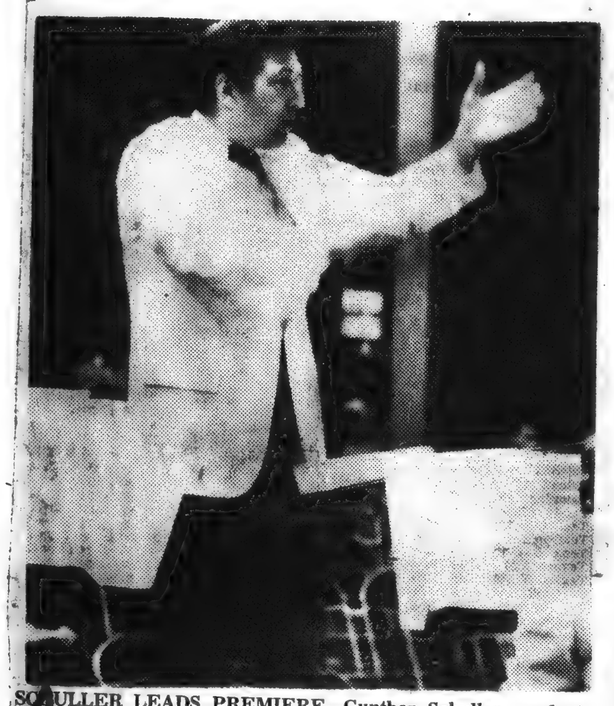
Robert Schumann's fourth Symphony also warmed Sunday's chilly afternoon breezes with its romantic melancholy. Appreciation requires here only a lonely dreamer's mind and, measuring the enthusiastic applause, there were many pleased dreamers on hand.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, August 10, 1964

At the Concert

Schuller Premiere Scores Tanglewood Success



SCHULLER LEADS PREMIERE—Gunther Schuller conducts the premiere of his new "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee" at Tanglewood.

By DANIEL L. CUSICK

The Tanglewood premiere of Gunther Schuller's "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee" met with a resounding success over the weekend.

Based on the ideas in paintings of the Swiss artist, the seven short works are not all of equal value as pieces of music.

Mr. Schuller conducted the performance of these miniatures, with the Boston Symphony, and though he is not the world's most able conductor, he did bring out the whimsy and color written into them.

★ ★ ★

THERE IS NO cohesion between the segments. Rather, they are like a suite of impressions.

The first, "Antique Harmonies" is no more than a study in an old form with nothing new to say. "Abstract Trio," which was the second of the series, sounded like something from the Hoffpung Festival recording of "Punkt, Contrapunkt" in its meaningless sounds being thrown back and forth between various instrumental trios.

With "The Twittering Machine" came the most delightful and inventive section for the entire seven creations. The orchestra took the role of a Dada-like mechanical device which wound up and down, making whistling and beeping noises vaguely recalling cartoon features in which a bird is being chased by the slightly silly cat. It was fun, the way much of art should be when not taking itself too seriously.

★ ★ ★

THE DISAPPOINTMENT of the suite was "Arabian Town." There is a charm and a challenge in capturing the authentic sounds of a native village, written for full symphonic ensemble, but the Boston Symphony musicians were made to play like a large Hollywood sound stage band. It was misuse of the resources at hand.

The traditional music of Tchaikowsky and Debussy balanced out the concert when they were under the direction of Boston's associate conductor, Richard Burgin.

If Burgin is to be believed, Tchaikowsky was a much more passionate man than even the history books give him credit for. The tear-in-lace-handkerchief sentimentality of the first and fourth movements was made even more sentimental by the conductor, but his readings of the second and third movements were something in the way of surprise.

★ ★ ★

THOUGH TCHAIKOWSKY scored the brasses with solidity in these movements, they are seldom allowed to resound as fully as they did for Mr. Burgin. He had them coming from the body of the ensemble like clear calls to another kind of music than was being heard. No weak trumpets and trombones here. Rather the hearty roaring out of statements too long buried.

Only the imprecise cueing which caused some faulty attacks marred the playing and kept it from being a thoroughly rewarding rendition of those movements.

Debussy's "La Mer" was Burgin's moment of triumph in the concert. He drew forth the rich tonal qualities of the score and made the Boston men return to their usual high standard of quality which they lacked in other portions of the concert.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
AUG 8 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106

AUG 1 0 1964

T-U AT TANGLEWOOD

Burgin Returns as Conductor

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

Richard Burgin, associate conductor and former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned to the stage at Tanglewood, Friday night in the role of guest conductor.

It was a triumph for Mr. Burgin. His was an authorative concept of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony and Debussy's tonal seascape, "LaMer." It was a concentrate of his long experience under numerous conductors, plus his own rugged individualism which evoked tremendous enthusiasm from the areas of both stage and shed.

For serio-comic relief, the orchestra should have been awarded an upper case "E" for effort after a performance of a Gunther Schuller's avante garde decibel devastation. Conducted by the composer, who is head of the composition department of the Music Center, the work, "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee" purported to be a wedding of the visual and aural arts in an attempt to translate the Swiss painters. Klee's canvasses, into musical facsimille.

Personally, I much prefer Moussorgsky's earlier experiment, "Pictures at an Exhibition," which incidentally, will be available for comparison, Sunday afternoon, Aug. 16. However, "a difference of opinion makes for a good horse race" as they say up in Saratoga. Mr. Schuller was given a great big hand by the younger element during the suite's inharmonic "progressions" while evoking chuckles and smirks from many of their non-hep elders.

Saturday night, the Erich Leinsdorf returned to the podium to lead his superb ensemble in a program of Beethoven, Richard Strauss and Gian Carlo Menotti. The orchestra was assisted by Phyllis Curtin, a favorite concert and operatic soprano in Strauss' "Three Hymns," with Justino Diaz, bass, Lili Chookasian, soprano, the Festival Chorus, and a children's chorus, recruited from the nearby summer vacation camps of the Berkshire Area, featured in the Menotti work.

Mr. Leinsdorf proved conclusively that it IS possible to integrate sight and sound to provide a "gallery" of appealing beauty.

Mr. Menotti's musical obituary, "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" was gratefully received.

Yesterday afternoon's program was tailored to every taste with the use of Hindemith's "Symphonie Metamorphosis" a work in the modern vein; Schumann's Symphony, No. 4, the least polite, but the most passionate utterance of the composer in the symphonic form, strong, sane and satisfying.

In addition an excerpt from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" which he titled: "Nachspiel," was included. Every facet of the scores was polished to the highest state of brilliancy by Mr. Leinsdorf.

It was a foregone conclusion, after his magnificent performance at Tanglewood last season that Cuban-born pianist Jorge Bolet would be re-engaged for the current series of concerts. Mr. Bolet is a big man, physically, intellectually, and technically. He elected to play two pianistic warhorses: "Perergon" by Richard Strauss and Liszt's monumental Fantasia on Themes from "The Ruins of Athens," with the orchestra.

The first work by Strauss was a study for the left hand alone. It must have been difficult for the thousands on the lawn to realize that the soloist was not using the full complement of a tremendous technique. The Liszt Fantasia brought into focus a careless contempt for its difficulties with no disregard of its melodic content.

The box office tally for the sixth weekend of concerts reached a healthy total of $23,643.

Music Review

Burgin Takes the Baton

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra played two of the most familiar and the most beloved works in the orchestral repertory last night for their associate conductor Richard Burgin. The Tchaikowsky Sixth Symphony and Debussy's "La Mer" were presented with the orchestra's most opulent tone for Burgin.

In the center of his program he gave way to Gunther Schuller, who conducted his own "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee." It was an interesting contrast to see Burgin, for 42 years the orchestra's concertmaster, draw the kind of sonority from the strings which he knew so well can be extracted from such crack sections. On the other side, Schuller, a former horn player, gave less attention, in his writing, to the strings and favored the winds. And with justification, too, for he was able to envisage tone combinations both in the brass and the reeds which were unusual and splendidly applicable to the pictures whose contents he was trying to convey by another medium.

* * *

Schuller used a lot of body English in his conducting, but it seemed to be effective. His dissonances, decently arrived at and quietly maintained, had a fascination when they expressed his idea of Klee's "Antique Harmonies," an airplane passing overhead seemed a planned part of the tonal picture.

It was inevitable that one think of the Hartman pictures which Moussorgsky used for the same basis of a musical work. There were some excellent moods established and some ludicrous situations produced. The "Little Blue Devils" developed into a jazz sketch with trap drums and a double bass set among a brass combo in a fetching little rhythmic pattern. Strings added a spastic jerk for no observable reason.

The "Twittering Machine" got a lot of laughs as Klee's idea of four birds on a machine which is set in motion by a handle like a hurdy-gurdy issue every type of whistle and burp.

* * *

THE "ARABIAN TOWN" started with a beautiful flute solo played off-stage by James Pappoutsakis and soon the solo viola of Jean Cauhape, a quarter-tone away from the otherwise unison drone of oboe Ralph Gomberg and the harp of Bernard Zighera, placed adjacently, do a song for a bagpipe for which only the belly-dancer was missing. Klee sees this as a network of straight lines which intersect and break off abruptly at right angles. He uses warm pink and yellow to convey a feeling of antiquity as Bach fugues convey a religious feeling. We'd rate this one an A.

The "Pastorale" is a lacy line of patterns in dull green. It is not yet clear why the music was so fascinating, and there is room for endless argument about the music per se or the success of Schuller's transcription of the Klee ideas.

* * *

GINO CIOFFI played the clarinet solos in the "Pathetique" with outstanding inflections and the English horn solos in the Debussy were done with great artistry by Louis Speyer.

After a lovely "Play of Waves," Burgin gave Debussy an analeptic swig and set him off on a pelagian voyage with animation and zest. The performance brought him an ovation of which not too small a share came from his colleagues on stage.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

AUG 1 7 1964

UNUSUAL WORKS PLAYED IN LENOX

Leinsdorf Leads Weekend of Novelty at Tanglewood

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9—Last night's Berkshire Festival Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra began with Beethoven's incidental music for "The Ruins of Athens." This afternoon's concert ended with Liszt's Fantasy for Piano and Orchestra and themes from the Beethoven score. Accompanying these were other works equally unusual, giving this weekend at Tanglewood greater interest than is customary.

Of 10 compositions played in three programs, including Friday's, six had not previously been played here. It was indicative of the imaginative and festival nature that Erich Leinsdorf, the musical director, has brought to Tanglewood. However unsatisfactory unfamiliar music may turn out to be, it still gives healthy and needed stimulus to this famous summer series.

Last night, the program included, besides the Beethoven, Richard Strauss's Three Hymns of Friedrich Hölderlin (Op. 71) and Gian Carlo Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi."

The Beethoven, about as much of a novelty as the 20th-century works, is hard to take seriously because of the theatrical venture it accompanied.

This was an allegorical spectacle glorifying royalty. The goddess Minerva is released from a 2,000-year imprisonment only to discover Athens in ruins, her temple — the Parthenon— the stable for the invading Turks' horses. Only in Pesth, Hungary, ruled by the Austrian Emperor, has classical Greek culture survived.

Ubiquitous Turkish March

The silly Turkish march from this score must be known to every budding pianist or student of music appreciation. A chorus of dervishes, chanting "Ka-a-ba," is just as funny, from today's perspective. Even Mr. Leinsdorf seemed to take this music lightheartedly as he conducted it in a physically bouncing fashion. But there are also serious moments that have the characteristic Beethoven nobility, especially the final apostrophe to Zeus, who is equated with the Emperor.

The excellent performance involved the orchestra, the festival chorus, Justino Diaz, bass, and Phyllis Curtin, soprano. Miss Curtin's contribution was confined to a brief duet with Mr. Diaz, but as soloist in the Strauss hymns she had a chance to shine, and shine she did with some lovely, intricate vocalism.

This set of three songs dates from 1921 and has an elaborate orchestral format. There is not much to say about the music, except that it is typical of Strauss and rather more long-winded than usual.

The first part, "Hymn to Love," goes on without much change in pace or variety in vocal line. "Return to the Homeland" offers more in graphic orchestral color, and the third, "Love," is the most affecting, with a darker harmonic scheme and a serene orchestral interlude before the final vocal phrases.

The Menotti cantata, which had its premiere at the May Festival in Cincinnati last year, crowded the stage with the 125-voice children's chorus drawn from neighboring camps, and the orchestra. Lili Chookasian, mezzo-soprano, and Mr. Diaz were the soloists.

Regrettable Crusade

The story of the Bishop who regrets that he blessed the 12th-century Children's Crusade, thereby sending thousands to their death, has inspired one of Mr. Menotti's most appealing scores. Perhaps this is because it is one of his briefest and simplest, dictated by having to write for children's voices. The children's music is frankly sentimental, but it serves the text admirably.

Mr. Leindsdorf led his forces in a splendid performance. The children sang with accuracy and sweetness of tone. Miss Chookasian, as the consoling nun, sang with rich tone, and Mr. Diaz brought emotional warmth and a beautiful voice to the part of the Bishop. Mr. Menotti was present and was recalled again and again by an enthusiastic audience.

This afternoon's program began with what, in the circumstances, could be called repertory staples, Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of themes by Weber and Schumann's Fourth Symphony.

The Hindemith was taken at a lively clip by Mr. Leinsdorf, and the orchestra was given a chance to show its virtuosity. The Schumann was given a tightly organized performance by the conductor, so that the symphony had momentum and cohesion and, paradoxically, a stress on its repetitiousness. But in both cases the results were engrossing.

Two works for piano and orchestra, derived from other orchestral scores, provided the concert with its rarities. They were Richard Strauss's "Parergon to the Sinfonia Domestica" (Op. 73) and the Liszt Fantasy on "The Ruins of Athens." Jorge Bolet was the soloist.

Paregon is Greek for by-work, and this supplementary product of his "Sinfonia Domestica" was written by Strauss in 1925. It is a long, one-movement piece with much dead wood and a few sections where the ornamental passages for piano against a subdued orchestral background stand out for their beauty.

Most of the piece's fascination stems from its having been written for Paul Wittgenstein, the left-handed pianist. Strauss's means of solving the technical problems demanded are interesting enough, and they create an opportunity for a technical stunt by the soloist. Mr. Bolet filled his role ably and with no little sensitivity where it was called for.

With two hands at his disposal, he cut loose in the Liszt, which is wonderfully entertaining. The dervish chorus and Turkish march are the main material for Liszt's fanciful work, and they help to give it the quality of a brilliant scherzo. Mr. Bolet, Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra performed the work with a bravura and flourish that gave it a maximum amount of fun and excitement. It made an effective finale for the orchestral programs of the weekend.

Attendance for the three concerts was 20,000, which was slightly below average. Cool weather may have had something to do with this, but a spokesman for the orchestra noted that among the festival weekends, this one had shown the least strength in advance sales. That might, unfortunately, be attributed to its high degree of novelty.

RAYMOND ERICSON.

NEW YORK
Journal American
D. 506,746 SUN. 640,586

AUG 10 1964

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

A 'Scholarly' Weekend

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., Aug. 10.—What Erich Leinsdorf called "Music for Festivals" brought considerable novelty to Berkshire Festival programs last weekend.

All three works Saturday night were not only first performances for Tanglewood but also for many of the 7,483 people present. Two works yesterday qualified similarly.

Then Mr. Leinsdorf linked Beethoven's "Occasional" piece "Ruins of Athens," "Nachspiel" of Saturday with Liszt's "Fantasia" on themes from it for Sunday for purposes of comparison, if desired.

Whether exhuming the Beethoven paid off in either case may be a matter of taste. The original had historical curiosity; the latter provided a vehicle for Jorge Bolet's pianistic prowess and his special interest in Liszt. A touch of pedantry lurked behind this programing especially since "The Ruins of Athens" does not enhance Beethoven's present stature.

★

THE IMPORTANT NOVELTY was a performance of Menotti's Cantata "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," first heard at the Cincinnati May Festival last year.

Using his own text for the fantastic story of the children's crusade in the year 1212, Menotti depicts the anguish of the bishop who had "blessed them to their doom" and cannot forgive himself for doing so.

The haunting simplicity with which he writes the children's choruses gives the work its special value. This became significant also in the beautiful quality of the children's voices in performance. They had been recruited from eight nearby camps and prepared by James Cunningham.

Obviously, they stole the show from both Justino Diaz, who sang the bass role of the bishop, and Lili Chookasian, who sang as the placating nun. Mr. Diaz's fine voice, however, proved insufficient to dramatize the bishop's torture, for he did not involve himself enough in that aspect of the text.

Those familiar with Menotti's music will recognize echoes of other works. "The Medium" figures prominently at the start both in the bishop's "Listen, Listen, Who's There?" and in the "other-worldly" impressionism to depict the children who haunt him.

Menotti's gift for free flowing melody and sense of theatre carry the score. Some problems of setting arise when a voice falls noticeably at the end of a question. Such matters do not obscure a well-conceived score which is inevitably effective.

★

AS THE THIRD WORK at this unusual concert, Strauss "Three Hymns of Friedrich Holderlin" checked up another performance for celebrating the composer's centennial. It allowed Phyllis Curtin to range impressively through Strauss' ample, lush melodies though she did not communicate the idea so glowingly that they were hymns of love.

Still another bit of homage to Strauss came yesterday with "Parergon (by work) to the Sinfonia Domestica," an interminable piece for the piano left hand with Strauss using all his tried and true orchestral formulas to extend its length.

When Liszt's tinsel trappings for the Beethoven followed, Mr. Bolet had a field day with both hands. He is, of course, quite equal to any technical demands. The Strauss was a tour de force, nonetheless.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted both concerts with his customary orderly procedure. The Hindemith and he Schumann also on yesterday's program fell into that category. This was, after all, his "scholarly" weekend. He may have not had his ears quite close enough to the ground: several of those pieces he unearthed could be shoveled right back into the ground, festival or no festival.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923

AUG 10 1964

97

Menotti Composition Inspired by Crusade

The religious fanaticism which swept France and Germany in the 13th century, resulting in the ill-fated "Children's Crusade," served as the inspiration for Gian Carlo Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi."

* * *

THE WORK USES a children's chorus, a chorus of townspeople (sung by the festival chorus), bass and soprano soloists as the bishop and attending nun at his death. The work was featured by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., Saturday night.

Soloists were Justino Diaz, bass, and Lili Chookasian, soprano. The festival chorus was prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon; the children's chorus, including children from camps in the Berkshire area, was prepared by James Cunningham.

The Menotti work was composed for the Cincinnati Musical Festival Association and first performed at the May Festival in Cincinnati in May, 1963.

* * *

THE CLOSING WORK on the program, made up entirely of first performances at Tanglewood, was powerful music and drew raves from the audience. The soloists were superb and the orchestra magnificent. Menotti, who wrote both the text and the music, was at the concert and at the close was called to the stage to share the ovation with the orchestra, conductor and soloists.

The bishop is portrayed on his deathbed, tormented by the memory of the children, who had sailed from Brindisi, lost at sea or captured by pirates and sold as slaves in the Orient.

* * *

THE SCORE calls for two pianos with the second pianist also playing the celesta. The celesta is used in the accompaniment for the children's chorus "I shall kiss Our Lord's tomb, I shall free the Holy Land" and also to accompany the nun as she tries to calm the dying bishop. The music which portrays the storm is magnificent in its fury. In places one can positively hear the whistling of the wind.

The Menotti work is one of many which Leinsdorf is introducing this season at Tanglewood.

Other works on the program were the Beethoven "Ruins of Athens" with Phyllis Curtin, soprano, and Diaz as bass soloist and the Strauss' "Three Hymns of Friedrich Helderlin, opus 71," with Miss Curtin as soloist.

* * *

TO MOST OF the public the Beethoven work is known principally by its "Chorus of Dervishes" and the "Marcia alla Turca" sections. Its six other movements, including choral sections and sections for solo voices, are seldom heard.

Leinsdorf, with the assistance of William Moyer, has made some additions to the Beethoven score in the "Chorus of Dervishes." In addition to the instruments called for by the composer, the orchestra used a tambourine, bass drum, triangle, castanets and tom-tom.

This was done in accordance with the Beethoven recommendation for the original score. For the Turkish march, which followed, the orchestra kept to the original scoring, including the insistent triangle.

* * *

THE STRAUSS work, also new to the Tanglewood audience, is one of the many song settings in the Strauss legacy.

The Friday night concert was conducted by Richard Bungin and the program yesterday afternoon by Leinsdorf.

An audience of 7,483 attended Saturday night, 5,283 Friday. The Tuesday night program drew 979, the open rehearsal Saturday 3,740.

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397

AUG 9 1964

MENOTTI WORK BLENDS VOICES AND ORCHESTRA

7483 Hear 'Death of Bishop of Brindisi' at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Once again Erich Leinsdorf has blended the brilliance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood with the voices of children and adults to produce a memorable performance of emotional power.

Superb Performance

A year ago he did it with Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem." Saturday night he did it for 7483 listeners with Gian-Carlo Menotti's "Death of the Bishop of Brindisi."

It was a superb performance of a work that the future may well find to be a masterpiece.

The cantata is a moving statement of remorse and faith founded on a story of the children's crusade of 1212. Menotti wrote the words and music for the Cincinnati festival of May, 1963. The score calls for soprano and bass solo, children's chorus, adult chorus and symphony orchestra. It lasted about 35 minutes.

On Death Bed

The bishop of the southeastern Italian town of Brindisi (sung by Justino Diaz) is on his death bed. He is attended by a nun (sung by Lili Chookasian).

In his agony he is wracked by guilt for having blessed the children of the crusade as they boarded their doomed ships even though he had tried to stop them.

He alternates between lucid self-reproach, during which he (and the audience) hears the nun try to reassure and quiet him, and hallucinations, during which he lives again the difficult moments with the children who plead for his blessing, and the townspeople, who at first encourage him and later condemn him.

From Berkshire Camps

About 125 boys and girls from eight Berkshire county camps sang the children's choruses with a sweetness and innocence of tone that surely made it impossible for the bishop to refuse their plea.

The Berkshire Festival Chorus (125), which portrayed the townspeople, was friendly when it was helping the children and angry with the bishop when the storm sank the children's ships.

"I blessed them to their doom," sings the bishop with anguish. "Was it God's will or my own folly?"

And in the end, the question is left unanswered.

Chorale of Peace

Bu tthe cantata finished with the unaccompanied chorus singing a chorale of peace." Sleep, "it bids the bishop, "Sleep O Gentle Pilgrim."

The cantata and the performance had so many virtues they cannot all be specified.

Diaz and Miss Chookasian were perfectly cast in their parts: His full bass showing strength of character in the midst of mental and physical agony; and her powerful soprano by turns admonishing and soothing, like a motherly nurse chiding and calming her patient.

The orchestra not only was an agile accompanist, but also shone its own light (most noticibly during the thunderous storm) because Menotti's orchestral score is fully as colorful as the vocal.

Called to Stage

It is a work of excitement and strength and it was given a wonderful performance. It was given thunderous applause, also, and so was Menotti when Leinsdorf called him to the stage.

Anything said about the first part of the program can be only anticlimactic, which is unfortunate because the evening began with an excellent performance of eight parts (nearly all) of Beethoven's "The Ruins of Athens" by orchestra and chorus, with soprano Phyllis Curtin and bass Justino Diaz.

The best of it was the looping, arching phrases of the Curtin-Diaz duet near the beginning, the strongly pulsing men's "Chorus of Dervishes" and the famous orchestral "Turkish March."

Miss Curtin sang the 30-minute "Three Hymns," Op. 71, by Richard Strauss, with great artistry just before intermission, but she was at the mercy of one of the composer's most demanding and repetitious vocal scores.

Nevertheless, she gave a valiant display of stamina and a fine performance of music that wore out this listener in its first 10 minutes.

But Menotti and his dramatic cantata soon rejuvenated him.

Herald Tribune NEW YORK
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

AUG 10 1964

Tanglewood: Muddled Theology

By Eric Salzman

LENOX, Mass.

Gian Carlo Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" had its first performance in the Northeast on Saturday night at the Berkshire Music Festival.

The piece, which was written for The Cincinnati May Fesetival last year, is a kind of dramatic cantata about the Children's Crusades. The bishop, on his deathbed, is haunted by the cries of drowning children; he tried to stop them but in the end had to give his blessing and send them off to their inevitable doom.

The score, for bass and soprano solos, children's and regular choruses, is a kind of ambitiously simple compound of the monastery scene from "Boris" Carl Orff and the familiar Puccini-Menotti operaticisms.

The first part of the piece has an essentially dramatic form; for a moment, the Bishop's fitful dying vision of the ragged, singing, doomed children takes on an almost visual immediacy—it is just the sort of dramatic, ironic confrontation that Menotti knows how to manage so well.

Then the piece wanders off into all kinds of confused theology. The musical and dramatic motion thins out to nothing as the good Bishop cries out for enlightenment in his agony. Why, he asks, was one who loved so purely "cursed with such destructive love." Sleep, says the chorus; God will hand you in death "the blinding answer."

We think we have it. The Bishop's confidence about the purity of his love is a clear case of o'erweening pride—and that (of course) goeth beforé a fall.

Justino Diaz as the Bishop and Lili Chookasian as a nun were effective. The children's chorus, recruited largely from nearby camps, was excellent. The Tanglewood chorus and the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf were convincing.

The first part of the program included three hymns of Freidrich Hoelderlin, Richard Strauss' Op.71, a fat chunk of continuously lush Straussiana that, after a while, gives the distinct impression that the composer fell asleep in the middle of it while continuing nevertheless to complete the composition. Phyllis Curtin did what she could with it. The Strauss orchestra kept threatening to indundate here in chicken fat, but she managed to stay above the surface most of the time and even make some of it quite beautiful.

Miss Curtin, Mr. Diaz and the chorus also participated in still another off-beat vocal work—the Beethoven "Ruins of Athens," that curious, semi-theatrical, embarrassing allegory with its famous Marcia alla Turca. A bundle of other marches and choruses and a hilarious hootchy-kootchy dance of the dervishes. Well, Beethoven had to make a living too. Actually, if it isn't very profound stuff, it is still amusing.

The conductor, in a Leinsdorfian gambit, put List's delightful "Fantasia on Themes from Beethoven's 'Ruins of Athens'" on yesterday afternoon's concert. This elegant piano-and-orchestra crowd-pleaser was programmed—more Leinsdorfianisms—with two other transformation pieces: Richard Strauss' "Parergon" for piano, left-hand only, and orchestra, based on themes from his own "Sinfonia Domestica" and the Hindemith symphonic metamorphosis on themes by Carl Maria von Weber.

The Strauss, written for Aul Wittgenstein, the one-armed pianist, is a bore although, if you have to undergo the Sinfonia Domestiva I would vote for the Reader's Digest version. Jorge Bolet was an impressive one-handed pianist in the Strauss and—except for a few clinkers—an even more impressive two-handed one in the Liszt.

There was a fourth work on the program—the Symphony No. 4 in D minor, which had a careful deliberate Leinsdorf reading, a little underpaced but clear. There were some intonation problems in the winds and a few cross purposes between piano and orchestra in the Strauss. It was an imaginative, perfectly odd afternoon and the musicians sounded perhaps a bit puzzled by it all.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,435

AUG 9 1964

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Emphasis was on voices with orchestral accompaniment at last night's Berkshire Festival Concert. Despite heavy showers during the day there was an audience of 7,483, many of whom listened from the outside grounds.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra and choruses with soloists in a program far removed from the commonplace, but developed into some of the festival's most exciting fare to date.

Peak of excitement was reached with Gian-Carlo Menotti's new cantata, "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," for chorus, children's chorus, bass and soprano solo, and orchestra.

Balance of Program

Balance of the program was Beethoven's "The Ruins of Athens," Nachtspiel, Opus 113, and Richard Strauss' "Three Hymns of Friedrich Holderlin," Opus 71.

Basis for Menotti's brilliant new score (the premiere was in Cincinnati last season) is a hymn supposedly sung in 1212 by 20,000 children in France, who were inspired by zeal to liberate the Holy Land, unescorted and unarmed. The actual setting is the bishop of Brindisi's death chamber where he is tortured by his memory of the children whom he had tried to stop but who went to their doom.

It is difficult to say which of the participants was the most splendid. The music itself is powerful, logical, inspired and descriptive. The composer was on hand even at yesterday morning's rehearsal — such was his interest in the Tanglewood performance.

Triumph

The children's chorus of 125 voices certainly had a triumph. They were youngsters recruited from neighboring summer camps, and prepared by James Cunningham. With eyes on conductor more than on score, they sang the statements of flaming courage with pure, clear quality, and veteran confidence. Their performance was a marvel of youthful achievement.

The voices of the townspeople (festival chorus of 125 mixed voices prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon) were vital and eloquent contributions to the narrative.

Although he had previously made a fine impression in Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," the young Puerto Rican bass Justino Diza was sensational, dramatically and vocally, as the bishop. He has one of the finest new voices we have heard at Tanglewood in many seasons. It has depth, penetration and warmth. The only flaw of consequence is a weakness in low range. This was less evident in the Menotti than the Beethoven where some of the low tones are enmeshed with horns. It would seem that the young man is headed for a big career.

Lili Chookasian was compelling in the role and score of the nun who attends the bishop in his last hour. She sang with fine quality and tasteful intensity. Hers was powerful declamation.

Everyone concerned was so spurred by the eloquence and spirit of the work that much the same ardor was felt at yesterday's rehearsal (attended by 3,740) as at last night's formal performance.

Wide Departure

Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" was a wide departure from his norm or primary fount of inspiration. It combines allegory with glorification of royality. Mythological figures who dart through the seven musical sections are Minerva, Zeus, High Priest, and Chorus. None is portrayed in detail. The only familiar part is the Turkish march, mainly because of piano transcriptions.

Because of its nature, there was little dramatic continuity to the work. For this reason there was no real point of climax. The orchestral overture was a cheerful prologue with breezy melodies and surface excitement. The small offstage chorus with its instruments gave atmospheric interest, but its function in the text was incidental.

The duet by soprano Phyllis Curtin and Diaz was a polished blend, beautiful in quality and richly textured. The chorus of dervishes received sharp, incisive phrasing from the men's chorus.

The final chorus in mixed voices (125) was valiant and expansive sounding.

Miss curtin brought radiance, understanding and glamour to strauss' Holderlin hymns.

"Hymn of Love" had a clear, ringing quality — a joyous outburst in which voice soared over substantial orchestral setting. The second, "Return to the Homeland," had prominent role for two harps and celesta.

It was a mood of happy recollection, beautifully voiced. Although Miss Curtin used score, there was little curtailment of personal communication.

Acccmpaniment good

The final song, "Love," was of serious mien with flighty moments, and others of intensity. Miss Curtin grasped these closely sequenced them, and ended on a note of elation. Orchestra and conductor gave her sumptuous accompaniments.

Cuban pianist Jorge Bloet is soloist for this afternoon's program, in Richard Strauss' "Paregon," and List's Fantasia in themes from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens." Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes of Carl Maria Von Weber, and Schumann's Fourth Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711

At Lenox

Menotti's 'Bishop' Appalling

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX—Here in the coun- I haven't the means for quickly verifying the quota- tion, but I remember that soon after Erich Leinsdorf was ap- pointed music director of the Boston Symphony, he issued a statement to the effect that from now on there would be a change in program policy. Only first rate music, no more Saint-Saens symphonies and that kind of thing. As a token, he took upon himself the task of introducing to this part of the country on Saturday night Gian Carlo Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brin- disi."

Perhaps Leinsdorf did it be- cause he thinks it a valuable work, possibly he programmed it because Menotti is a popular and celebrated com- poser. Whatever the motive, the occasion was appalling. "The death of the Bishop of Brindisi" is a work to make one long to have Bernstein's "Kaddish" back.

Occasionaly in his work Menotti has used subject mat- ter whose purpose has been to reveal some of the rather em- barrasing byways of his mind. Those pieces have as a rule been failures with the public. The popular Menotti is the one who has taken subject matter, arranged often with considerable flair, that is cal- culated to engage the emotions powerfully. In that sense "The Bishop" clearly belongs with "The Consul" and "Amahl"; It has had great suc- cess with the public since it was first given at the Cincin- nati May Festival last year, most of the audience here loved it, and it will undoubt- edly be done often at least for some years.

The subject this time is the Children's Crusade of the early 13th century. As the bishop lies dying, his con- science is haunted by the chil- dren who sailed from Brindi- si in ramshackle ships to their doom.

He had tried to dissuade, but pressure from the towns- people had cornered him into sending the children off with his blessing. The ordinary citizens, whose hysteria makes the work into an interesting political parable on the side, then turn upon the bishop and want to destroy him.

Almost inevitably for Me- notti, some dramatic strokes are in a theatrical sense ef- fectively managed, and the flashback technique — for everything is viewed looking back from the bishop's death- bed—is quite serviceable. But what matters here is not how engaging or important the sub- ject is, but how it has been translated into musical terms. And here Menotti suggested once more that he really is a man of the stage who has drifted into music as though by accident and with an amateur's equipment for composition.

By now there is little point in reiterating that from the viewpoint of taste and artistry Menotti's work is hardly dis- cussable. This includes the flowery text. As I listened to the half hour cantata it struck me, just as it had while study- ing the score previously, that the man really cannot compose.

He cannot move coherently from one idea to the next. Where the harmonies are not of hymn-book banality, they are nonsensical. The phrase structure and overall rhythm are either commonplace or clumsy. The music is not well written for orchestra. The score is overloaded with use- less and self-defeating doub- lings and the orchestration in general sounds the way I im- agine paper towels taste. In fact, Menotti is the only com- poser I know who cannot even reliably score a unison.

As for the rest of the week- end's program, there were two more events in the Rich- ard Strauss centennial, the Hoelderlin hymns for soprano and orchestra, and the Parer- gon to the Sinfonia Domestica for piano, left hand and or- chestra.

Neither is much good. The hymns are amusing in that they provide the source ma- terial for the later, and greatly superior, four last songs. There are the familiar cliches, and the emptiness is transparently veiled by the unrelenting lushness. Whether or not they are apt settings of their texts I cannot say because the per- formance did not render the poetry audible.

The "Papergon," written for the one armed pianist Paul Wittgenstein, is not only unin- teresting save for an occasional detail—the first piano entrance for an example—but incompe- tent in that Strauss did not bother to think through the problem of composing for half a pianist, as it were. Unlike Ravel, he wrote in effect half a piano concerto, and the com- bination of the stupidly un- imaginative piano writing and the overripe orchestration makes the solo part go pretty well for nothing.

Beethoven's "Ruins of Ath- ens" music, which gets a bad press in all standard Beetho- ven books, proved unexpected- ly diverting. There is very handsome soprano-base duet, some good march music, both solemn and rowdy. That was done on Saturday, and on Sun- day afternoon we had Liszt's Fantasia upon it for piano and orchestra. It is flashy, of course, but strikingly inventive and imaginative.

Earlier on Sunday there were two standard pieces, Schuman's D Minor Symphony, and Hin- demith's "Symphonic Metamor- phoses of Themes by Weber" (Just what is the title of that anyway?—It never seems to be listed the same way twice.)

All of this involved per- formers too numerous to ap- praise in detail. There was the Boston Symphony, of course, and Erich Leinsdorf was in charge of both con- certs.

After the conductors that have been around here lately, it would in any case have been a pleasure to get him back, so superior is he to the Ormandys, Steinbergs, Rudolfs, etcetera. Moreover, he was in his best form this week-end, and pro- duced excellent performances, specially of the Beethoven, Schumann and Hindemith.

Phyllis Curtin, except for the diction problem, sang beauti- fully in the Beethoven and Strauss, even though what Leinsdorf gave her in the hymns seemed more nearly a straight jacket than an accom- paniment.

Justino Diaz, bass, and Lili Chookasian, alto, sang effec- tively in the Menotti, as did the Festival Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon; and a group of children's choruses, prepared by James Cunning- ham.

Except for the problem of inaudibility in the Strauss "Parergon"—and this I am in- clined to ascribe to the com- poser—Jorge Bolet was an adequate soloist in the two works requiring piano.

Patriot Ledger (E)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
AUG 10 1964

Jorge Bolet's Performance Wins Tanglewood Audience

By PETER M. KNAPP

LENOX — In weather mor suitable for football than outdoo summer concerts, Erich Leinsdor and the Boston Symphony Orches ra introduced two more compos ions to the Berkshire Music Fes ival yesterday afternoon.

In both items, Jorge Bolet wa the soloist and his admirable per ormance won warming applaus rom 6,158 wind-whipped patrons t was unfortunate that the musi itself did not match the after noon's soloist: the two Tangle wood premieres were third-rat Richard Strauss and fourth-rate Franz Liszt.

First Mr. Bolet took to the Bald win for Strauss' "Parergon" (or 'by-work") to the "Sinfonia Do mestica," Opus 73, in which Strauss returned to his earlier score to produce a kind of super- variations on a theme from the "Sinfonia." "Parergon" is a rhap- sodical, free and brilliant show- piece with some interesting ideas amidst its essentially arid mean- derings. Perhaps its most pro- vocative section occurs near the beginning, when Strauss achieves the effect of a gypsy band accom- panying a cimbalom solo.

"Parergon" is an oddity be- cause its solo part is written for the left hand only, being one of the works commissioned by the one-armed pianist, Paul Wittgen- stein. Mr. Bolet's one-handed ren- dition of the intricate piano score, which makes few concessions to a pianist and would be quite suf- ficient for both hands, was quite a tour de force.

No less worthy was the artistry Mr. Bolet squandered on the vapid Liszt Fantasy on Themes from Beethoven's "The Ruins of Athens" for piano and orchestral accompaniment. "The Ruins" is bad Beethoven: the fantasy is ex- tra bad Liszt. Why Mr. Leinsdorf with his refined sense of musical values would program this exer- cise in poor taste is a complete mystery. Yet this kind of im- provisatory and dazzling varia- tions on well-known tunes was ex- actly what the public of Liszt's time expected, and the master pianist was only too willing to comply.

Mr. Bolet gave the music exact- ly what it required — lots of bra- vura. But the Cuban-born pianist didn't overplay the virtuous role and there were sensitive varia- tions in tonal color and dynamics to go with the rousing octaves and the lacy scale-work. He earned his ovation.

Earlier, Mr. Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony in a superb reading of Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber and a less-suc- cessful performance of Schu- mann's Symphony No. 4 in d minor, Opus 120.

The Hindemith, actually a sym- phony in which the composer im- proved upon lesser themes of Weber, is a colorful score in the tradition of Richard Strauss. The work is a masterpiece of orches- tration, though its musical content is considerably less. The jolly first movement, with its playful dia- logues of percussion and winds, is specially fine. Mr. Leinsdorf ex- cels in this type of score, and his musicians responded with nuance and precision.

The beautiful, romantic Schu- mann symphony, though, sounded too constricted throughout. The orchestra seemed uncomfortable early in the first movement when the ends of phrases were quickly clipped off before being permitted to come into bloom. The last movement lost its coherency toward the end, when the final threads are being gathered. The general impression was of a lack of freedom, of reins being held too tightly.

The bright spot of Saturday night's concert was Gian-Carlo Menotti's year-old cantata, "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi." Attendance was 7,483 on a chilly, windy evening.

For this work, the Boston Sym- phony and Mr. Leinsdorf were joined by the Festival Chorus, a large children's chorus from camps in the area around Tangle- wood, soprano Lili Chookasian and bass Justino Diaz.

Menotti's cantata, premiered at last year's May Festival in Cin- cinnati, was inspired by the Chil- dren's Crusade of 1212. The Bishop of Brindisi, Italy, is on his death- bed, attended by a nun. When the children arrived in Brindisi, the bishop had attempted to dissuade them from sailing to liberate the Holy Land. When he finally re- lented and gave them his bless- ing, the children perished at sea in a storm.

And now, on his deathbed, the bishop's memories "unlock their secret dungeons to haunt these crumbling halls like evil mice." Menotti's paradox — the guilt of the innocent, the turning of pure love into destructive love — is resolved only in religious mysti- cism. "Nothing is purposeless . . . why should God have given you in life a questioning mind if not to hand to you in death the blinding answer?"

Menotti's poetic mind has phrased a metaphysical problem in often memorable and dramatic lines. His text, as usual, is pun- gent with deft metaphors. His music, derivative and eclectic per- haps, nevertheless is quite strik- ing in some passages, although prosaic and banal in others. Its flavor closely resembles the powerful clock scene of Mussorg- sky's "Boris Godunov."

In his cantata, Menotti makes much use of modal harmonies and open intervals — perfect fourths and fifths — which transmits the quality of early church plainsong. The battery gets a good workout, too — chimes, gongs, cymbals, drums, xylophone.

The performance was first-rate, and the composer was present to share the ovation.

Mr. Diaz was impressive as the bishop. The young Puerto Rican who won the Metropolitan Opera Auditions in 1963 had the kind of clear, resonant, strong bass that should guarantee him a distin- guished career.

Miss Chookasian, a sumptuous- voiced mezzo, was equally out- standing as the nun. The chil- dren's chorus was surprisingly good for a collection of young campers asked to sing demanding music. The lights of the Tangle- wood shed were left on to enable the audience to follow the text, but this unfortunately detracted from the cantata's drama.

Otherwise, the program was un- distinguished, although all three works were Tanglewood premi- eres. Mr. Leinsdorf opened with Beethoven's music for "The Ruins of Athens," Opus 113, written as part of a dramatic piece for the opening of a new theater at Buda- pest in 1812. The piece seethes with painful allegory and oozes with praise for the Austrian em- peror.

It is obvious, empty music which tries to be brilliant and im- pressive but succeeds only in be- traying its own lack of substance. The amusing Chorus of Dervishes and the Turkish March are the only excerpts performed much to- day. Mr. Diaz and soprano Phyllis Curtin took the solo parts with style, but in general the perform- ance was uninteresting and at worst, sloppy. The horns had a particularly bad time.

Miss Curtin then struggled with Three Hymns of Friedrich Hoel- derlin, Opus 71, by Richard Strauss that convey little but rest- lessness and Straussian neurosis. The orchestral part is brilliant and sonorous, requiring the solo- ist to sing at full voice, and mostly toward the top of the regis- ter. Miss Curtin did what she could with her normally resplen- dent soprano, but the results were disappointing, particularly in com- munication. Hardly a word came through.

American (E)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,200
AUG 10 1964

Pianist Ends Tanglewood Week End

(Special to The American)

LENOX, MASS. — The sud- den change to cool weather in the Berkshires yesterday after- noon may have caused a drop in the attendance figures, but had no effect upon the enthu- siastic responses of the 6,158 in the audience that heard Jorge Bolet, pianist, in two solo num- bers from Strauss and Liszt, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

It was a week end that saw also the superb performance Saturday night of Gian-Carlo Menotti's "Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" with a chorus of 125 young people gathered from eight summer camps in the Tanglewood area. Menotti's or- chestral score was fully as col- orful as the vocal score. Menot- ti was given a thunderous re- ception when Leinsdorf brought him to the stage.

Yesterday afternoon Bolet played both selections with great technical accomplish- ment. The Strauss "Parergon to the Sinfonia Domestica" for piano and orchestra was for the left hand only. The Liszt was fantasia on themes from Bee- thoven's "The Ruins of Ath- ens." It was unfortunate that Leinsdorf had not given the pi- anist selections more worthy of his talent. The performance of Schumann's "Symphony No. 4, in D Minor" was a major por- tion of the program and, played without pause between the four movements, was worth the trip to the Berkshires.

The Friday night concert, with Richard Burgin, retired concertmaster of the orchestra, conducting, presented Debus- sy's "La Mer," Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6, the Pathe- tique," and Schuller's "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee." This concert drew 5,283. Attendance for the week end, including the open rehearsal Saturday morning, was 23,643. There were almost 7,500 present for the Menotti cantata.

Features This Week

An added feature this week is the festival of contemporary American music sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Each day through Thursday evening there will be special programs in the theater-concert hall at 8 p. m.

Programs during the coming week end will bring two guest conductors. Max Rudolf will conduct Friday night with a program of Smetana, Bee- thoven, Strauss and Stravinsky. Sunday afternoon Seiji Ozawa will conduct music of Hinde- mith, Moussorgsky and Strauss. Ozawa is musical director of the Ravinia Festival. Max Ru- dolf is conductor of the Cincin- nati Orchestra. For each con- ductor it will be his first ap- pearance at Tanglewood.

Lest someone think Leinsdorf is taking a vacation, he will conduct on Saturday night when Lorin Hollander, pianist, will perform the Strauss "Burleske" in D minor. The program will include also Wagner's prelude to Act I of "Tristan and Isolde," Mendelssohn's com- plete music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" with the Tan- glewood Choir, and Sydeman's "Study for Orchestra No. 1." Sunday morning there will again be a program of the mu- sic of J. S. Bach in the thea- ter at 10 a. m.

S. M.

Music Preview

Weekend Concerts at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE SIXTH weekend at Tanglewood ended with a pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in which the problems for the performers and for the audience were comparatively minor. Erich Leinsdorf had selected two programs of special interest, but generally speaking, of less than heroic dimensions.

Yesterday afternoon before intermission the Symphonic Variations by Hindemith on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber and the Schumann Fourth Symphony, D Minor, Opus 120, received readings with the orchestra and their conductor at the top of their fettle.

* * *

HINDEMITH writes with a twinkle in his pen. There has been no one with such a sense of wit writing music in this era. There is a swing and a subtle gaiety to all four movements. The late composer wrote this playful music while a teacher at Yale 20 years ago, shortly after he had been on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. There is an unquenchable exuberance which even infects the charmingly lyric Siciliano. This was happy music making.

The Schumann symphony is Leinsdorf's secure base. His manner of therapeutic vivisection can be applied to such music most beneficially. When the patient is such as the Boston orchestra, the results can be highly successful. What might be a careful reading in other hands becomes relaxed and natural in Leinsdorf's. His idea of "lively" is not reckless nor uncontrolled. The symphony is played without pause, but the conductor rested amply and long on the initial chord of the Romanze before he allowed oboist Ralph Gomberg and acting principal cellist Martin Hoherman to proceed into the naive little melody which Brahms later must have had in the back of his head on several occasions. The graceful, decorative line which Schumann gives the principal violin in this moment was conspicuously beautiful in concertmaster Joseph Silverstein's playing. No

Whitestone

Conductor Leinsdorf bestows the accolade on soprano Curtin performance exposed Schumann's use of themes in different settings better than that of Leinsdorf yesterday.

* * *

FOR THE SECOND half of the afternoon, Jorge Bolet was the piano soloist in two rare vehicles: Strauss' "Parergon" to his own "Sinfonia Domestica," a piece specifically written for an artist who had lost his right arm in World War I, and Liszt's Fantasia on Themes from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens."

Bolet's superb capabilities were not given full and due advantage. The work for the left hand only is pleasant. A "parergon" is an ornamental accessory. Leinsdorf reduced his forces but Strauss had written too heavily for orchestra and poor Bolet's capabilities struggled against the combination of Strauss plus Leinsdorf with only moderate success. The Liszt is less worthy as music but more flamboyant. The catalogue of Liszt's music in Grove's Musical Dictionary requires more pages than either Mozart or Beethoven. Liszt turned out these paraphrases nearly like a printing press. He wrote some sort of rehash for piano for every opera and fragment on which he could hang showy adornments. These are period pieces and are amusing only as relics. Its use yesterday had a special juxtaposition because the original "Ruins" had been played the previous evening. There was little other justification.

* * *

SATURDAY night was an evening of music for voice—solos and chorus. The new work of Gian Carlo Menotti, "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," was eagerly anticipated. It requires a huge boys' chorus, a mixed chorus, bass and soprano soloists and orchestra. Leinsdorf had enlisted voices from eight summer camps in the vicinity, and the way in which they performed and the manner in which he held them in discipline was a marvel. Perhaps the preparation by James Cunningham should be given a major share of the credit, but, in any case, it was good fun. Not, as might have been expected, in a solemn way that the subject might have elicited, but, all in all, an excellent addition to the evening.

Menotti was in the hall and came on stage at Leinsdorf's invitation. He was apparently elated with the performance and was a little incoherent in his gestures to include everyone in the general ovation.

* * *

THE DOMINANT vocal role falls to the Bishop, sung majestically by Justino Diaz. It is he who, in Menotti's account, tries from his deathbed to assuage the catastrophe of the Children's Crusade which, legend has it, took place some 700 years ago. A nun, well sung by Lili Chookasian, attends him in his final hours. Some of the assignments for the soloists are a sort of Sprechstimme, a declamation without musical shape. The Bishop chastises himself and in his despondence cries, "I blessed them on their doom."

Menotti's overture is a pleasant if conventional movement which leads into the first message from the Bishop to which weaving cellos provide support. But then there is a surprising boom as he cries "Listen, who's there?" The nun tries to quiet his fears as his conscience raises doubts in his mind. The assignments of the nun are in general more quiet. Once Menotti uses only a harp to accompany the nun. At another point, soft wind instruments lend a sacred basis for her attempts to steer his floundering soul toward the emerging haven."

The Festival chorus was "The Townspeople" it is they, among other times, who at the end give the final and closing blessing. Menotti here writes a swift and punching attack to his "Let them depart!" But he quiets down and ends on a plaintive whisper as he asks "Are not the innocents the very messengers of God?"

* * *

THE CONCERT began with Beethoven's play, "The Ruins of Athens," his Opus 113, but not in the same nature as the surrounding opera of the same era. Mr. Diaz and Phyllis Curtin were the soloists. The chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon, performed no doubt accurately. This was pastime music, well worth hearing once and justifiably included on a festival program such as this.

Miss Curtin had a more ample opportunity for her art in Strauss' "Three Hymns of Friederich Holderlin" a contemporary of Beethoven. His subjects are fine distinctions between love, affection and friendship. Leinsdorf used a reduced orchestra, yet Strauss wrote such full orchestration against his soloist that only a voice such as Miss Curtin's was capable of maintaining hegemony over the situation. Her clear and lucid clarion commanded the situation. For a moment Strauss and Leinsdorf decreased the power of the orchestra for the more intimate "Return to the Homeland," but the volume and status quo soon returned. Miss Curtin was at all times more than adequate to this.

An audience of 7,438 derived great pleasure from the evening, but the presence of all the parents of the small and young singers in the Menotti lent a spirit of enthusiasm to the reception as of a sixth grade graduation compounded several times.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

AUG 10 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451

Music: Balanced Program At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — One of this summer's best balanced and appealing programs of the Berkshire Music Festival was given yesterday afternoon to close the sixth weekend of Tanglewood concerts.

The audience of 6,158 made a weekend total of 23,643.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber, and Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D Minor, Opus 120. Jorge Bolet was piano soloist in Parergon to the Sinfonia Domestica, Opus 73, and Liszt s Fantasia on Themes from Beethoven's "The Ruins of Athens."

Orchestra and conductor took painstaking effort to present the Hindemith "Metamorphosis" as a set of four instrumental abstractions. One could draw his own pictures, as he chose.

Gala Beginning

The spiced harmonies and agile rhythms of the "Allegro" made a gala concert opener, contrary to the idea that contemporary music should come last. "Turandot" delved into quiet mysticism with fine work accomplished by flute (Doriot Anthony Dwyer), percussion, and timpani (Everett Firth). Counterpoint was not labored but served to promote the work's indelible wit. It was light music, without dead weight.

In Schumann's symphony, contrast was combined with unity. After a poised, pensive introduction, the first movement let in brighter lights and sparkle. Yet, the restless character was clearly in evidence. The slow movement theme was expressive, rather than plaintive, thereby averting a common pitfall. The rigorous scherzo paved the way to a fast-moving brilliant finale.

Sensationalism

Bolet and "sensational performance" have become synonymous. Yesterday outright sensationalism was added. Neither Liszt's "Fantasia" nor Strauss' rehash of the "Domestic" Symphony amount to much without eye-popping display, and a type of showmanship that would be destructive to a seriously artistic, valuable work.

Strauss' "Parergon" could have been nothing more than a heinously difficult novelty for the left hand. "Parergon" or "by work" means that Strauss used material from his "Domestic" Symphony and dolled it up as a left hand opus. It's a difficult but feeble vehicle, as piano concertos go, for one or both hands.

Bolet's left hand technique equals the average pianist's 10-finger work. It required looking to make certain that only the left hand was being used.

When piano melodies could be heard, they were put forward (mainly with left thumb) and the inevitable breaks in passage work were rectified with astute pedaling.

Bolet trimmed Strauss' text wisely, but the long, arduous cadenza was enough to incite audience enthusiasm.

No one but a lovesick pianist could deter the Liszt Fantasia from its natural bent. It's a grandiloquent, artificial dazzling, shallow, splashy exhibition of pyrotechnics and sentiment.

When the orchestra finished its introductory march, Bolet pulled out all the stops, technical and emotional. He swept through the bristling cadenza like a power saw. The "Turkish March" portion turned from pompous to deafening.

When every technical booby-trap had been hurdled, soloist and orchestra hit a homer and won the pennant.

The festival begins its seventh and next-to-last weekend of concerts on Friday night when Max Rudolf conducts the Boston Symphony in Smetana's "From Bohemian Forests," Beethoven's Second Symphony, Richard Strauss' "Macbeth," and Stravinsky's "Firebird" suite.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
AUG 10 1964

Zesty Schumann, Tricky Liszt, At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Jorge Bolet, Cuban pianist, was the visiting virtuoso at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon. But the best music on the program came before his appearance.

"Metamorphoses" Played

For an audience of 6158, Erich Leinsdorf first led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphoses of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber." Then there was Schumann's Fourth Symphony.

After intermission Bolet joined the orchestra to play the solo part of "Parergon to the Sinfonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss, and "Fantasia on Themes from Beethoven's 'The Ruins of Athens' " by Liszt.

In increasing order of appreciation Sunday afternoon we would rearrange the list to read Strauss, Liszt, Hindemith and Schumann.

Clipped Precision

The Schumann symphony, except for the second movement, was played with the clipped precision appropriate to Mozart and the muscular virility appropriate to Beethoven. And the legato melodies of the second movement were supple and smooth.

Zip and zest were a couple of the ingredients Leinsdorf mixed into the symphony. They are spices more conductors might use to advantage when they direct this music.

There was much vitality in the Hindemith, also. But in that case it was written into the score, especially in the first and fourth movements, which were bright and lively like Fourth of July sparklers.

The second movement, too, was pleasing. Its jazz brass and woodwind syncopations were handled with a free, capricious spirit.

Bolet's Specialty

Liszt's music is one of Bolet's specialties, and Sunday he played the Fantasia like and old hand, in spite of a few errors of fingering.

The score is a great crowd pleaser, full of acrobatic fingering, exciting rhythms and pianistic tricks. It was fun, as usual, like a magician's slight of hand. But that's all.

The "Parergon," like so much of Strauss' late work, started with a few impressive measures and then settled into a turgid sea of mud, accented only by some glittering piano notes when the dense orchestration let the other 100 musicians recede occasionally.

It was written for the one-handed pianist Paul Wittgenstein, who lost his right arm as a result of a wound received in World War I. He played it once in this country, in Cincinnati in 1934, and gave up saying, "it too tiring."

He was right.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 93,580
AUG 10 1964

Weather Cuts Attendance At Tanglewood

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Attendance at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood continues to be mediocre, partly because of unseasonable weather, but there is nothing mediocre about the concerts. Yesterday the combination of Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony and Jorge Bolet's pianistic power and charm drew only 6,158 on a partly sunny, cold day. Saturday brought 7,483 and Friday 5,283.

The coming weekend will present three conductors: Max Rudolf, Erich Leinsdorf and Seiji Ozawa.

Extended Treatment

The title of Hindemoth's "Symphonic Metamorphosis of

Gazette Review

Themes by Carl Maria von Weber" sounds like a complex scientific experiment, but the music is actually extended treatment, brisk and resounding for the most part, of some of Weber's less famous tunes. Leinsdorf handled his forces with efficiency and warmth throughout this work. He and they gave constantly the impression that they were enjoying their task.

The Schumann Symphony No. 4 in D minor was refreshing. Except for places near the end of the first and fourth movements, where the score seemed rather trite, the music glowed with alternations of sentiment, brooding quality and occasional rugged turbulence.

The first movement was elastic and alive, with lovely melodies. The "Romanze" built on winds, adding rich low strings and violins in the lower register. The "Scherzo" contrasted strongly, offset initial rhythms with a delightfully casual midsection. I liked the finale's serious introduction better than its florid climax.

Bolet, heard in Worcester both at the Festival and in recitals, has added still further to his impressive bulk and power. He played a stunning version of Richard Strauss' "Parergon to the Sinfonia Domestica," for left hand only, with orchestra. The title denotes simply a working over of old material, in this case from Strauss' "Domestic Symphony," written 22 years earlier.

Bolet displayed remarkable vitality in sweeping runs, and was heard clearly (but not noisily) at will, above the full-voiced orchestra. He also had a delightful singing tone for more tranquil moments. His playing of the Liszt Fantasy on Themes from Beethoven's "The Ruins of Athens" was well varied and full of good showmanship. The famous "Turkish March" was introduced cleverly in the latter part of the piece.

102 7TH WEEK AUGUST 10TH – 16TH.

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 423,849 SAT. 142,176

AUG 11 1964

PATRICIA PEARDON will narrate the Shakespeare text with Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Eric Leinsdorf at Tanglewood on Saturday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BRIDGEPORT, Conn.
Circ. 64,213

AUG 9 1964

PATRICIA Peardon, who is appearing as Lady Anne in Richard III and as Ursula in Much Ado About Nothing at the Stratford Shakespeare Theater, will recite the solo narration of A Midsummer Night's Dream at the Tanglewood Music Festival on Saturday night. She will be accompanied by the Boston Symphony presenting the arrangement of Mendelssohn's music of the same title and the Tanglewood Choir. This is her second annual guest appearance at Tanglewood.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 – 742-4200

HAVERHILL, MASS.
Journal
Eve. Circ. 12,431

AUG 10 1964

AT TANGLEWOOD — Max Rudolph, Music Director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time on Friday evening at 8 in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. The program will include Smetana's Symphonic Poem "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows;" Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 36; Strauss' Tone Poem "Macbeth," (after Shakespeare's Drama), Opus 23; and Stravinsky's Suite from the Ballet, "L'oiseau de feu."

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 – 742-4200

HAVERHILL, MASS.
Journal
Eve. Circ. 12,431

AUG 14 1964

LORIN HOLLANDER pianist, will perform Strauss' Burleske in D minor for Piano and Orchestra with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdof, Music Director, conducting, on Saturday evening at 8:00 in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. Other works on the program will be Wagner's Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde", Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2; and Mendelssohn's Overture (Opus 21), and Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Opus 61. Helen Boatwright, soprano, and June Genovese, mezzosoprano, will be the vocal soloist, and Patricia Peardon will be the narrator. through the courtesy of the American Shakespeare Festival.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News
WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 1,200

AUG 13 1964

Leinsdorf, Ozawa, Rudolph to Conduct BSO at Tanglewood

Works by Beethoven, Wagner, Mendelssohn, and Stravinsky will be among those featured in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Tanglewood in Lenox this weekend.

Friday night's concert at eight o'clock will be conducted by Max Rudolf. The program includes "From Bohemia's Forests" by Smetana; Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 36; "Macbeth" by Richard Strauss; and the "Firebird" Suite by Stravinsky.

On Saturday at eight o'clock, Erich Leinsdorf will direct the orchestra in the Prelude to Act I of "Tristan and Isolde" (Wagner), Study for Orchestra No. 2 (Sydeman), "Burleske" in D minor (Strauss), and "A Midsummer Night's Dream" featuring the Tanglewood Choir (Mendelssohn).

Sunday afternoon at 2:30, the orchestra, directed by Seji Ozawa, will play Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky, and the Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome," Op. 54 by Strauss.

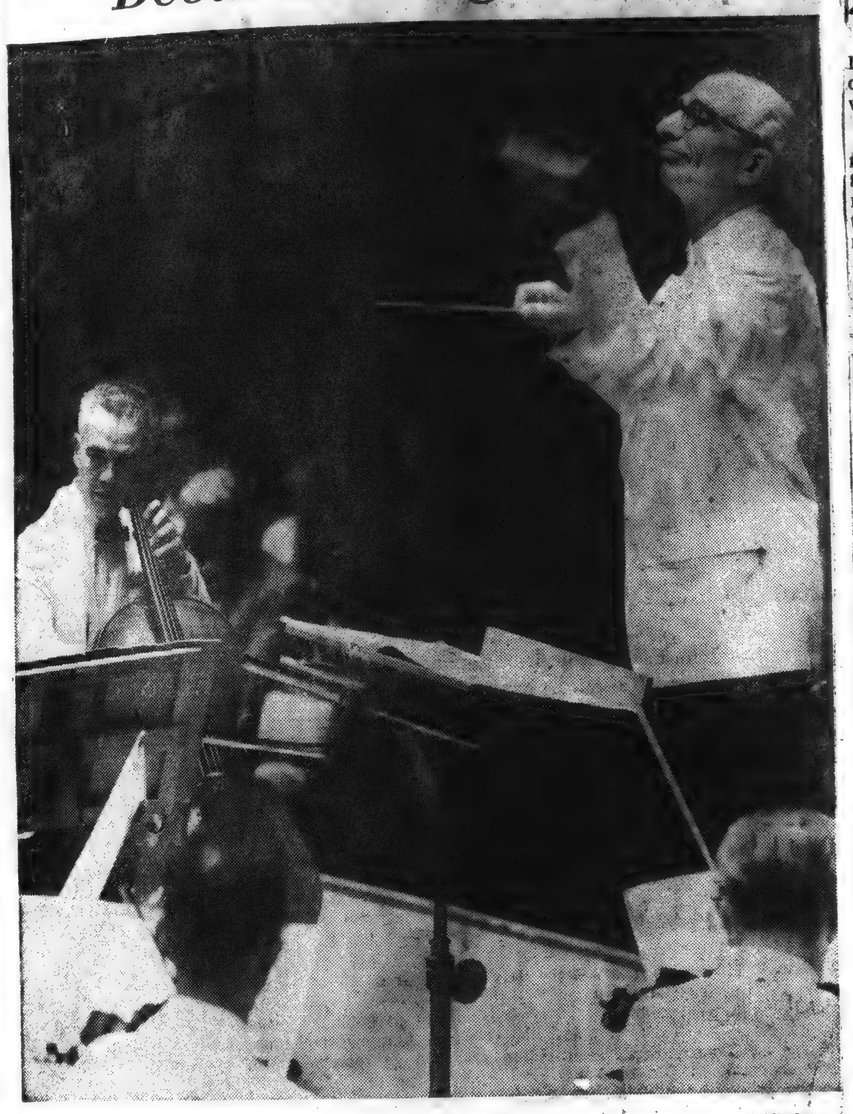
NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 – 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,

AUG 15 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2070, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304
AUG 15 1964

Debut at Tanglewood.



Whitestone

Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, conducted at Tanglewood last night in his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He also is assisting with the course for conductors introduced this summer at the Berkshire Music Center after the late Pierre Monteux was forced to cancel his classes in Hancock, Maine. At left facing camera is Samuel Mayes, principal cellist with the BSO.

BOSTON, MASS.
Evening Globe
Eve. Circ. 144,855
AUG 17 1964

Japanese Conductor

Music for Young Adults ... Modern If Not New

By MARGO MILLER

LENOX — The last time — the Summer of 1960 — a young Japanese conductor named Seiji Ozawa was at Tanglewood he went away with the Serge Koussevitzky Memorial Conducting Award and the hope that either the New York Philharmonic or the Cleveland Orchestra would take him on as assistant to their music directors.

Sunday Ozawa, now 28, married and the possessor of three kids, was in the Music Shed, leading not the Berkshire Center Orchestra but Boston Symphony. Slight but broad-shouldered, he won an ovation from a crowd which has been markedly cool to other guest conductors this season. Ozawa was replaying Pierre Monteux, who died July 1.

Ozawa has just finished a seven-week season as music director of the Ravinia Festival in Chicago. This Winter he will go back to the New York Philharmonic as assistant conductor, and in the 1965-66 season he will have his own orchestra, the Toronto Symphony.

Young men are always prey to the advice of their elders. Ozawa has had his quota from that elder statesman of music, Igor Stravinsky. In print and in conversation, the composer tells young conductors to learn as much music of their contemporaries as possible and to bring it before the public.

Feeling that "young adults" would be most receptive to modern, if not new, music, Ozawa inaugurated a new series this Summer at Ravinia. These Sunday concerts, called the "Four O'Clocks," included works by Milhaud, Poulenc, Ives, Harris, Bernstein, Legetti and Stravinsky. Next year Ozawa will expand this series to take in some of the younger Americans.

Japanese musicians of his own generation, Ozawa says, have their ears attuned to the avant garde. Electronic and chance music are more in fashion than serialism. "We have no one like Copland but we have many John Cages and Luigi Nonos. Japan has Tchaikovsky and the old European composers on concert programs but almost nothing between them and the really new."

SEIJI OZAWA

He thinks the war years account for some of the gap in musical tastes.

Ozawa, born in Manchuria, then a province of Japan, got his early training at the Toho School of Music. He was a pianist. He was also the only conducting student, in an institution which now has two orchestras but has always produced more violinists than other instrumentalists. "Japanese don't have the lungs and lips for the woodwinds and brass," he says.

Besides, Ozawa thinks that his countrymen prefer, because of their fine and nimble fingers, the digital precision work of a stringed instrument. "It's like assembling televisions, transistors, cameras."

Shortly before making that statement, Ozawa had greeted Japanese teachers touring the U.S. and recording the Tanglewood rehearsal with their home product.

In 1959 Ozawa went to Europe for further study. In Paris he was a private pupil of the octogenarian Eugene Bigot.

"His teaching was as father to son, something out of the last century. Everything had to be just so, much based on solfege, tempos just so, all head and so French. If you wanted to use this," said Ozawa, pointing to his heart, "Bigot said it was bad music."

The heart gesture, which Ozawa used often Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood, was reminiscent of Charles Munch, who found Ozawa at a French festival and persuaded him to enter the Berkshire Music Center. His teacher there was Eleazar de Carvalho, now of St. Louis. During his Paris residence, Ozawa traveled monthly to West Berlin for master classes with Herbert von Karajan and the State Opera Orchestra.

The student years, all would agree and Stravinsky insist, are the years for the young conductor to learn the standard repertoire. Conducting, no longer composing, is Ozawa's chosen profession and he's finding the old warhorses still a challenge. Hindemith's "Mathis" Symphony is coming into that category; Ozawa had led it only once before. If he has any lament, it is for more time to work on composers like Brahms. "The more you conduct them, the more you have to work." Ozawa's sentiment would be that of men twice and three times his age.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923
AUG 12 1964

Two Guest Conductors At Tanglewood Concerts

Two guest conductors will lead the Boston symphony in concerts this weekend at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

* * *

MAX RUDOLF of the Cincinnati orchestra will conduct at 8 p.m. Friday; and Seiji Ozawa, music director of Ravinia festival, will lead the Sunday afternoon concert, beginning at 2:30.

The program Friday will include Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, Richard Strauss' Macbeth and the "Firebird Suite" from the ballet by Stravinsky.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct at 8:30 p.m. Saturday in a program that will begin with the prelude to Wagner's opera, "Tristan and Isolde." This will be followed by William Sydeman's "Study for Orchestra No. 2," which received its world premier by the Boston symphony last November. last November.

* * *

LORIN HOLLANDER, pianist, will play Strauss' "Burleske" in D minor for piano and orchestra. The concert will close with Mendelssohn's overture and incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Patricia Peardon of the American Shakespeare Festival will narrate selections from the play. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and June Genovese, mezzo-soprano.

There will be an open rehearsal Saturday at 10 a.m.

Osawa, who won the Serge Koussevitsky conducting prize in 1960 as a member of the Berkshire Music Center's conducting department, was invited to appear with the symphony when the late Pierre Monteux became ill and was forced to cancel his summer appearances.

* * *

THE PROGRAM will include Bizet's Symphony in C Major, the "Mathis der Maler" symphony by Hindemith and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Ravel.

The Lenox quartet will present a concert of chamber music at 8 tonight. The program will be quartets by Carter, Berger, Schuller and Kirchner.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2070, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
DANBURY, CONN.
News-Times
Eve. Circ. 23,828
AUG 14 1964

A Tanglewood Weekend

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted by Max Rudolph when it performs tonight at 8 o'clock in the Shed at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewod in Lenox, Mass.

Numbers programmed are: "From Bohemia's Forests" by Smetana; Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 36; Strauss' "Macbeth" and the "Firebird" Suite by Stravinsky.

Tomorrow night's Shed concert at 8 o'clock, with Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the orchestra, conducting, will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the following program: Wagner's Prelude to Act I of "Tristan and Isolde"; Study for Orchestra No. 2, by Sydeman; Richard Strauss' "Burleske" in D Minor (Hollander soloist); and the complete music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" by Mendelssohn, assisted by soloists, narrator and the Tanglewood Choir.

Tomorrow morning's open rehearsal of the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Shed will be held as usual at 10 o'clock, open to the public.

Sunday's events will be a concert of chamber music by J.S. Bach to be held in the Theatre at 10 a.m. and the concert by the full Boston Symphony with Seiji Ozawa, a guest conductor, directing. The program announced is as follows; Mathis der Maler, by Hindemith; Pictures at an Exhibition by Moussorgsky; Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome," Op. 54 by Richard Strauss.

A string symposium is scheduled for Sunday evening at 8, on the Chamber Music Hall, and again Monday at 2:30 and 8 p.m. Both are "Friends" events.

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,422
AUG 15 1964

Seiji Ozawa Guest Conductor At Tanglewood

Director Erich Leinsdorf has invited Seiji Ozawa, director of the Ravinia Festival, to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow at 2:30 p.m. at Tanglewood.

Mr. Leinsdorf's program today at 8 p.m. will begin with Wagner's Prelude to Act I of "Tristan and Isolde." This will be followed by William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2 which received its world premiere by the Boston Orchestra in Boston on Nov. 22, 1963.

Lorin Hollander will then join the orchestra for the performance of Richard Strauss' "Burleske." The concert will close with Mendelssohn's Overture and Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Patricia Peardon will appear as Narrator for selections from Shakespeare's play which were chosen by Mr. Leinsdorf. Miss Peardon appears at Tanglewood through the courtesy of the American Shakespeare Festival. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, sobrano and June Genovese, mezzo-soprano.

Tomorrow's concert at which Mr. Ozawa will conduct will include Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler; Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," and Strauss' "Dance of the Seven Veils" from Salome.

104

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 32,009

AUG 10 1964

Boston Symphony Lists Tanglewood Programs

The program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Friday at 8 p.m. will include Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5," Richard Strauss' "Macbeth" and Stravinsky's "Firebird Suite." Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra, will conduct.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the program by the Boston Symphony Saturday at 8 p.m. when Loren Hollander, pianist, will be the soloist in "Burleske" by Richard Strauss. Other numbers will be the prelude to the first act of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," William Sydeman's "Study for Orchestra No. 2" and the overture and incidental music from Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Ravinia Festival, will be the conductor Sunday at 2:30 p.m. The program will include Bizet's "Symphony in C Major," Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Ravel.

There will be an open rehearsal by the orchestra Saturday at 10 a.m.

The chamber music concert tomorrow at 8 p.m. will be by the Lenox Quartet which will present quarters by Carter, Berger, Schuller and Kirchner.

Programs open this week to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Festival include the Festival of Contemporary Music concerts tonight at 8 and Wednesday and Thursday at 8 p.m., and chamber music programs tomorrow and Friday at 3:30 p.m. and a Bach concert Sunday at 10 a.m.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, August 9, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

GREENVILLE LOCAL
Wednesday, August 12, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

CAIRO HERALD
Thursday, August 13, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ATHENS HERALD
Thursday, August 13, 1964

Guest Conductors, Soloist at Tanglewood

MAX RUDOLF
Guest Conductor Friday

SEIJI OZAWA
Conducts Next Sunday

LORIN HOLLANDER
Soloist Saturday

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,787

AUG 13 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

DANBURY, CONN.
News-Times
Eve. Circ. 23,828

AUG 11 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106

AUG 9 1964

GREENVILLE, N. Y.
LOCAL
W. 500

AUG 12 1964

CAIRO, N. Y.
HERALD
W. 300

AUG 13 1964

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FLATBUSH LIFE
W. 15,500

AUG 8 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

HAVERHILL, MASS.
Journal
Eve. Circ. 12,431

AUG 12 1964

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS COURIER
W. 15,200

AUG 8 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586

AUG 9 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132

AUG 13 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

AUG 8 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240

AUG 8 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193

AUG 9 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397

AUG 9 1964

3 Conductors To Share Podium At Tanglewood

Two conductorial colleagues of Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make their first Berkshire Festival appearances this week at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra, and Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Ravinia Festival, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 2:30 p.m., respectively. The Saturday evening concert at 8 will be directed by Mr. Leinsdorf who will have as guest soloist Lorin Hollander in a performance of Richard Strauss' "Burleske."

Friday evening's performance will include Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows", the Symphony No. 2 by Beethoven, Richard Strauss' "Macbeth" and the "Firebird Suite" from the ballet by Stravinsky.

Mr. Leinsdorf's program on Saturday evening will begin with Wagner's Prelude to Act I of "Tristan and Isolde" and will be followed by William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2 which received its world premiere by Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last November. Mr. Hollander will join the orchestra for the performance of Strauss's "Burleske" and the closing number will be Mendelssohn's Overture and Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream". Patricia Peardon will appear through the courtesy of the American Shakespeare Festival, as narrator for selections from Shakespeare's play which were chosen by Mr. Leinsdorf. Soloists will be Helen Boatwirght, soprano and June Genovese, mezzo-soprano.

An open rehearsal for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund will be held at 10 a.m. Saturday morning.

Since his summer as a member of the Berkshire Music Center's conducting department in 1960 when he won the Serge Koussevitzky Memorial Conducting Prize, for a conductor of great merit, Seiji Ozawa has won wide acclaim in this country and abroad for his musical interpretations. When the late Pierre Monteaux became ill and was forced to cancel his summer appearances, Mr. Leinsdorf invited Ozawa to conduct the Sunday program of Aug. 16. This concert will begin with Bizet's Symphony in C major and will include the symphony, "Mathis der Maler" by Hindemith, and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" arranged for orchestra by Ravel.

Mr. Rudolf and Mrs. Leinsdorf have each programmed a work by Richard Strauss continuing the Berkshire Festival's commemoration of the composer's 100th birthday, and also works in connection with the 400th anniversary of the birth of William Shakespeare, namely, Strauss' tone poem, "Macbeth" and Mendelsshon's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711

AUG 15 1964

At Tanglewood

Macbeth'

To Strauss

MICHAEL STEINBER
(Globe Music Critic)

ENOX—Max Rudolf of cinnati Symphony con the opening concert of enth weekend at Tan od. He contributed t rent Strauss celebration forming "MacBeth", an led Semtana's "From nia's Forest and Meado Beethoven Second S ny, and the suite from sky's Firebird."

MacBeth" is an interes e and well worth as onal revival. It was formed in 1890, after n", but it had been ntially completed as 1886. The maturin uss and the definit idiom clearly took p ween "MacBeth" and n."

MacBeth" hardly so Strauss. It is far r ilar to the Liszt tone p t anything he did

The Cincinnati Post AND TIMES STA
D. 251,226

AUG 20 1964

Ovation

Word from Lenox, tells of the standing o accorded Max Rudol sic director of the nati Symphony Orc when he conducted cert by the Boston phony Orchestra night at Tanglewood Center.

Gen Parchman, of the Cincinnati tra's double bass wrote that only on guest conducto brought the sophi Tanglewood audienc feet this summer.

He was Eugene Or conductor of the P phia Orchestra.

Mr. Rudolf's prog cluded the Symph 2 by Beethoven;

REVIEWS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711

AUG 1 1 1964

At Tanglewood

'Macbeth'--Contribution To Strauss Celebration

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
(Globe Music Critic)

LENOX—Max Rudolf of the Cincinnati Symphony conducted the opening concert of the seventh weekend at Tanglewood. He contributed to the current Strauss celebration by performing "MacBeth", and he also led Semtana's "From Bohemia's Forest and Meadows", the Beethoven Second Symphony, and the suite from Stravinsky's Firebird.

"MacBeth" is an interesting piece and well worth an occasional revival. It was first performed in 1890, after "Don Juan", but it had been substantialy completed as early as 1886. The maturing of Strauss and the definition of his idiom clearly took place between "MacBeth" and "Don Juan."

"MacBeth" hardly sounds like Strauss. It is far more similar to the Lizt tone poems that anything he did later, and that makes it not unlike the Smetana piece heard at the beginning of the concert. That was interesting programming.

It doesn't even look like Strauss on the page. In the later Strauss tone poems one always gets to a point where suddenly it is necessary to flip the score sideways: so thick has the music become that two pages are needed to accommodate all the lines.

That never happens in "Macbeth" and there is none of all the orchestral busy-work that produced that gorgeous impasto so typical of the later pieces. Rhythmically "Macbeth" has the strong sense of beat inherent in early 19th century music instead of the Wagnerian tidal waves that later become so important to Strauss' sense of motion.

There is Wagner here, but it is "Tannhaeuser" rather than the chromatic of "Tristan." There is a good bit of Weber, and plenty of Beethoven. "Macbeth" starts with a rumble of low A, joined by E in the next measure, and the next event is a vigorous downward leap of a fourth A-E; then, after a rhetorical pause a march theme in dotted rhythms is announced in D minor. It is almost exactly the opening of the Bethover Ninth, a piece very frequently reincarnated in the later 19th century, hardly ever more literally than here.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

AUG 1 6 1964

Music: Rudolf Conducts

Brings Tradition Back to Tanglewood

By HOWARD KLEIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 14—As if to provide an antidote to the just concluded Contemporary Music festival here at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its seventh weekend of concerts Friday night with a program firmly entrenched in the 19th century, with token representation from the 20th.

The modern work, if any more than 50 years old can be called modern, was Stravinksy's "Firebird Suite." It was preceded by Strauss's early tone poem "Macbeth," part of the continuing salute to his 100th birthday. There were also Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D and Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows."

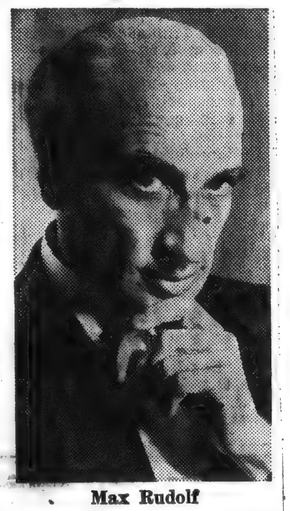
●

Max Rudolf was making his first appearance with the orchestra, and he showed himself to be a precise workman and a careful stylist. The 62-year-old conductor, who was born in Germany, has led operas at the Metropolitan and is now the conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony.

He made the best impression with his vivid reading of the Stravinsky. The unreserved bravos that greeted the celebrated finale were well deserved, for Mr. Rudolf had led a first-class performance that was tonally lavish and rhythmically exciting.

It was obvious that he had the full support of the players, for his spare movements were responded to with rhythmic and dynamic accuracy.

Mr. Rudolf stepped in to complete the conducting faculty three weeks ago, because Pierre Monteux, who was to have headed the department, had died on July 1. If Mr. Rudolf's teaching is as good as his conducting, his students are learning much. Like many conductors trained in Germany, he exercises great control over the music with a minimum of involvement. But his aloofness gets results.



Max Rudolf

It was interesting to hear his idea of the Beethoven. It was a suave and genteel Viennese interpretation, well-mannered rather than dramatic.

●

The Smetana symphonic poem, civilized and accurate, made a smooth and palatable opening. And the Strauss was also easy to listen to, even if the piece is not so successful as its cousin, "Don Juan."

The temperature in the shed was 52 degrees Friday night, but the audience seemed to realize it was a brilliant concert and it stayed to the brilliant end.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

AUG 15 1964

Music Review

Max Rudolph at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE SEVENTH weekend at Tanglewood will again have two guest conductors. Sunday afternoon Seizi Ozawa will occupy the podium, this evening Erich Leinsdorf will be at his usual post as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and last night Max Rudolph made his Tanglewood debut and sole appearance of the season. Rudolph, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, played an early Beethoven symphony and surrounded it with three tone poems, all from far different sources. Bedrich Smetana called his "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows" a symphonic poem, and Stravinsky's "Firebird" was a ballet. Only Strauss' "Macbeth" carried the exact appellation of tone poem but all three were attempts to tell a story or convey a message beyond the absolute music of a Beethoven symphony.

* * *

THE EVENING started with the Smetana, one of a cycle he included under the general title of "My Country." His music was filled with unfailing affection and nostalgia for the joys of his people and the beauty of the land, a veritable homesickness which Dvorak a little later also expressed in his music.

Rudolph's Beethoven was good for one's spirit. It was genuine and without attempt at veneer. The second was a favorite of Monteux who had listed it for one of his appearances this season. If my memory serves he took the Scherzo more recklessly, but Rudolph's more disciplined reading was valid and gratifying, too. A touch of the schoolmaster at times was discernible but otherwise the guest's baton technique was exemplary.

There was a double significance to the "Macbeth," celebrating, as it does, cenennia for the composer and the writer of the drama on which the music is based. Strauss and Stravinsky were both in their mid-20s when they wrote "Macbeth" and "The Firebird," respectively. "Macbeth" was the first of Strauss' tone poems, and he already showed the individualistic language he was to use and develop throughout his ensuing 60 years. It is overpowering in its massive orchestration and deep, glowing color.

* * *

STRAUSS is not as successful in his Lady Macbeth theme as he was in the Dulcinea and later allusions to heroines in his poem but the motifs of conscience and doubt and the seductive theme are phenomenal for a composer at the beginning of his career.

"L'Oiseau de Feu" was also a first for Stravinsky in 1909 when the great ballet entrepreneur Daghileff was starting his fabulous Paris era of combining all the arts this was the first commission he gave Stravinsky. Rudolph maintained a remarkable sang-froid while taming the fury Stravinsky engenders in portraying in music the old Russian legend of the Fire Bird. When first presented it was called a "danced story." It needs no choreography now to give an audience excitement and vivid pleasure. Despite the frigid evening an audience of 4,378 gave Rudolph their all-out enthusiasm.

The Cincinnati Post
AND TIMES STAR
D. 251,226

AUG 2 0 1964

Ovation for Rudolf

Word from Lenox, Mass., tells of the standing ovation accorded Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, when he conducted a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night at Tanglewood Music Center.

Gen Parchman, member of the Cincinnati orchestra's double bass section, wrote that only one other guest conductor has brought the sophisticated Tanglewood audience to its feet this summer.

He was Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Mr. Rudolf's program included the Symphony No. 2 by Beethoven; Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite and "Macbeth," a tone poem by Richard Strauss. Mr. Rudolf, chairman of the Tanglewood Conducting School, was also guest conductor of the Boston orchestra in a concert Aug. 7.

Mr. Parchman is enrolled in the conducting course this summer.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

WORCESTER, MASS.
Telegram
Morn. Circ. 58,744

AUG 15 1964

Music:

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — A Tanglewood audience of 4,378 met a new and distinctive podium personality in Max Rudolf who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the opening concert of the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh and next to last weekend.

Rudolf is conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. His program left little margin for error.

The one risky item was Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Macbeth," a pallid work that has been overshaddowed by the composer's six other symphonic poems and is rarely played. Last night's performance, the first for here, was part of the composer's birth-centennial being observed at Tanglewood this summer.

To the Finish

Strauss' work tries to sum up the character and soul struggles of Shakespeare's protagonist. The original version ended with a triumphal march for Macduff. Last night's version kept Macbeth in the limelight to the finish.

Balance of the Program was Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 36; Smetana's symphonic poem "Srom Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," and Stravinsky's ballet suit "Firebird."

In Beethoven's Second Symphony, Rudolf's thought, style, and acumen came under clearest scrutiny. He did not strictly follow the beaten path in the Beethoven.

Outstanding impression was its freshness of spirit. The conductor was out to capture every strand of melodic beauty — not only in the obvious slow movement. In sum, it was a forthright, ravishing performance.

Smetana's "Forrest and Meadows" is some of the most easily consumed and digested music of the 19th Century. It is filled with surging power, lyricism, and rhapsodic action that are second nature to the Boston Symphony. Rudlof extracted two primary elements ffom this music - pictorial illusion and rich tonal coloration. Most important, the Slavic spirit and temperament were maintained.

Leinsdorf Tonight

Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Bostom Symphony tonight. Orchestral works are the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and William Sydeman's study for Orchestra No. 2.

Lorin Hollander is piano soloist in Strauss' "Burleske." For a complete performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, the orchestra will be assisted by the Tanglewood Choir, Helen Boatwright, soprano, and June Genovese, mezzo - soprano. Patricia Peardon is narrator.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193

AUG 15 1964

Max Rudolf Conducts at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Shed at Tanglewood Friday night.

Hands-Off Leader

He showed himself to be a regulation, reliable, journeyman, hands-off leader who set the music in motion, kept it going and, for the most part, let it speak for itself.

He stood with a straight back and a stately manner and was economical and businesslike with his graphic instructions.

Perhaps it was because of this economy and perhaps it was because of the somewhat deliberate speeds he set, but there was an impression that he was directing his attention toward the music rather than the musicians.

One result was that the famed virtuosity of Boston's orchestra had ample space for display. Not only were the fiddlers' arms moving simultaneously, but also the exactness of the ensemble unity was nearly unbelievable.

Accuracy Surpassed

Even considering the orchestra's normal high standard of exactness, that accuracy was surpassed during Beethoven's Second Symphony, which followed Smetana's symphonic poem, "From Bohemia's Forest and Meadows," before intermission.

The Smetana piece, written to portray the people and geography of his native land, Czechoslovakia, is music of varying moods, all pleasant.

The dynamics of the Beethoven symphony were confined to exclude the extremes of loudness and softness, but within those limits there was constant, subtle and sensitive change.

This shifting of emphasis kept the symphony from monotony in spite of the volume limits at the top and bottom and the generally pedestrian tempos. (The fourth movement was up to a speed more commonly expected).

Strauss, Stravinsky

After intermission the program offered Richard Strauss' first tone poem, "Macbeth" and Stravinsky's suite from the "Firebird" ballet. The Strauss tone poem was written when the composer was still full of musical ginger and, in spite of the title, before he began to try to recreate profound philosophical ideas in orchestral sound. Consequently, the piece has some of the brilliant color of the Stravinsky suite.

Both use the full complement of symphonic instruments, and, even though the Strauss was written to sound thicker than the Stravinsky, it had much of the same sort of gleam and glitter Friday night.

The chill of the afternoon didn't frighten away all the possible listeners. There were 4378 in warm coats and blankets and, in at least one case, mittens. The temperature was 52.

REVIEWS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711
AUG 15 1964

At Tanglewood

'Macbeth'--Contribution To Strauss Celebration

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
(Globe Music Critic)

LENOX—Max Rudolf of the Cincinnati Symphony conducted the opening concert of the seventh weekend at Tanglewood. He contributed to the current Strauss celebration by performing "MacBeth", and he also led Semtana's "From Bohemia's Forest and Meadows", the Beethoven Second Symphony, and the suite from Stravinsky's Firebird."

"MacBeth" is an interesting piece and well worth an occasional revival. It was first performed in 1890, after "Don Juan", but it had been substantialy completed as early as 1886. The maturing of Strauss and the definition of his idiom clearly took place between "MacBeth" and "Don Juan."

"MacBeth" hardly sounds like Strauss. It is far more similar to the Lizt tone poems that anything he did later, and that makes it not unlike the Smetana piece heard at the beginning of the concert. That was interesting programming.

It doesn't even look like Strauss on the page. In the later Strauss tone poems one always gets to a point where suddenly it is necessary to flip the score sideways: so thick has the music become that two pages are needed to accommodate all the lines.

That never happens in "Macbeth" and there is none of all the orchestral busy-work that produced that gorgeous impasto so typical of the later pieces. Rhythmically "Macbeth" has the strong sense of beat inherent in early 19th century music instead of the Wagnerian tidal waves that later become so important to Strauss' sense of motion.

There is Wagner here, but it is "Tannhaeuser" rather than the chromatic of "Tristan." There is a good bit of Weber and plenty of Beethoven. "Macbeth" starts with a rumble of low A, joined by E in the next measure, and the next event is a vigorous downward leap of a fourth A-E; then, after a rhetorical pause a march theme in dotted rhythms is announced in D minor. It is almost exactly the opening of the Bethoven Ninth, a piece very frequently reincarnated in the later 19th century, hardly ever more literally than here.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785
AUG 16 1964

Music: Rudolf Conducts

Brings Tradition Back to Tanglewood

By HOWARD KLEIN
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 14—As if to provide an antidote to the just concluded Contemporary Music festival here at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its [illegible] weekend of concerts Friday night with a program firmly entrenched in the 19th century, with token representation from the 20th.

The modern work, if any more than 50 years old can be called modern, was Stravinksy's "Firebird Suite." It was preceded by Strauss's early tone poem "Macbeth," part of the continuing salute to his 100th birthday. There were also Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D and Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows."

Max Rudolf was making his first appearance with the orchestra, and he showed himself to be a precise workman and a careful stylist. The 62-year-old conductor, who was born in Germany, has led operas at the Metropolitan and is now the conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony.

He made the best impression with his vivid reading of the Stravinsky. The unreserved bravos that greeted the celebrated finale were well deserved, for Mr. Rudolf had led a first-class performance that was tonally lavish and rhythmically exciting.

It was obvious that he had the full support of the players, for his spare movements were responded to with rhythmic and dynamic accuracy.

Mr. Rudolf stepped in to complete the conducting faculty three weeks ago, because Pierre Monteux, who was to have headed the department, had died on July 1. If Mr. Rudolf's teaching is as good as his conducting, his students are learning much. Like many conductors trained in Germany, he exercises great control over the music with a minimum of involvement. But his aloofness gets results.

It was interesting to hear his idea of the Beethoven. It was a suave and genteel Viennese interpretation, well-mannered rather than dramatic.

The Smetana symphonic poem, civilized and accurate, made a smooth and palatable opening. And the Strauss was also easy to listen to, even if the piece is not so successful as its cousin, "Don Juan."

The temperature in the shed was 52 degrees Friday night, but the audience seemed to realize it was a brilliant concert and it stayed to the brilliant end.

Max Rudolf

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304
AUG 15 1964

Music Review

Max Rudolph at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE SEVENTH weekend at Tanglewood will again have two guest conductors. Sunday afternoon Seizi Ozawa will occupy the podium, this evening Erich Leinsdorf will be at his usual post as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and last night Max Rudolph made his Tanglewood debut and sole appearance of the season. Rudolph, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, played an early Beethoven symphony and surrounded it with three tone poems, all from far different sources. Bedrich Smetana called his "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows" a symphonic poem, and Stravinsky's "Firebird" was a ballet. Only Strauss' "Macbeth" carried the exact appellation of tone poem but all three were attempts to tell a story or convey a message beyond the absolute music of a Beethoven symphony.

* * *

THE EVENING started with the Smetana, one of a cycle he included under the general title of "My Country." His music was filled with unfailing affection and nostalgia for the joys of his people and the beauty of the land, a veritable homesickness which Dvorak a little later also expressed in his music.

Rudolph's Beethoven was good for one's spirit. It was genuine and without attempt at veneer. The second was a favorite of Monteux who had listed it for one of his appearances this season. If my memory serves he took the Scherzo more recklessly, but Rudolph's more disciplined reading was valid and gratifying, too. A touch of the schoolmaster at times was discernible but otherwise the guest's baton technique was exemplary.

There was a double significance to the "Macbeth," celebrating, as it does, cenennia for the composer and the writer of the drama on which the music is based. Strauss and Stravinsky were both in their mid-20s when they wrote "Macbeth" and "The Firebird," respectively. "Macbeth" was the first of Strauss' tone poems, and he already showed the individualistic language he was to use and develop throughout his ensuing 60 years. It is overpowering in its massive orchestration and deep, glowing color.

* * *

STRAUSS is not as successful in his Lady Macbeth theme as he was in the Dulcinea and later allusions to heroines in his poem but the motifs of conscience and doubt and the seductive theme are phenomenal for a composer at the beginning of his career.

"L'Oiseau de Feu" was also a first for Stravinsky in 1909 when the great ballet entrepreneur Daghileff was starting his fabulous Paris era of combining all the arts this was the first commission he gave Stravinsky. Rudolph maintained a remarkable sang-froid while taming the fury Stravinsky engenders in portraying in music the old Russian legend of the Fire Bird. When first presented it was called a "danced story." It needs no choreography now to give an audience excitement and vivid pleasure. Despite the frigid evening an audience of 4,378 gave Rudolph their all-out enthusiasm.

The Cincinnati Post
AND TIMES STAR
D. 251,226
AUG 20 1964

Ovation for Rudolf

Word from Lenox, Mass., tells of the standing ovation accorded Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, when he conducted a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night at Tanglewood Music Center.

Gen Parchman, member of the Cincinnati orchestra's double bass section, wrote that only one other guest conductor has brought the sophisticated Tanglewood audience to its feet this summer.

He was Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Mr. Rudolf's program included the Symphony No. 2 by Beethoven; Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite and "Macbeth," a tone poem by Richard Strauss. Mr. Rudolf, chairman of the Tanglewood Conducting School, was also guest conductor of the Boston orchestra in a concert Aug. 7.

Mr. Parchman is enrolled in the conducting course this summer.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WORCESTER, MASS.
Telegram
Morn. Circ. 58,744
AUG 15 1964

Music:

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — A Tanglewood audience of 4,378 met a new and distinctive podium personality in Max Rudolf who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the opening concert of the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh and next to last weekend.

Rudolf is conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. His program left little margin for error.

The one risky item was Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Macbeth," a pallid work that has been overshaddowed by the composer's six other symphonic poems and is rarely played. Last night's performance, the first for here, was part of the composer's birth-centennial being observed at Tanglewood this summer.

To the Finish

Strauss' work tries to sum up the character and soul struggles of Shakespeare's protagonist. The original version ended with a triumphal march for Macduff. Last night's version kept Macbeth in the limelight to the finish.

Balance of the Program was Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 36. Smetana's symphonic poem "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," and Stravinsky's ballet suite "Firebird."

In Beethoven's Second Symphony, Rudolf's thought, style and acumen came under clearest scrutiny. He did not strictly follow the beaten path in the Beethoven.

Outstanding impression was its freshness of spirit. The conductor was out to capture every strand of melodic beauty — not only in the obvious slow movement. In sum, it was a forthright, ravishing performance.

Smetana's "Forrest and Meadows" is some of the most easily consumed and digested music of the 19th Century. It is filled with surging power, lyricism, and rhapsodic action that are second nature to the Boston Symphony. Rudlof extracted two primary elements from this music - pictorial illusion and rich tonal coloration. Most important, the Slavic spirit and temperament were maintained.

Leinsdorf Tonight

Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony tonight. Orchestral works are the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and William Sydeman's study for Orchestra No. 2.

Lorin Hollander is piano soloist in Strauss' "Burleske." For a complete performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, the orchestra will be assisted by the Tanglewood Choir, Helen Boatwright, soprano, and June Genese, mezzo - soprano. Patricia [illegible]

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193
AUG 15 1964

Max Rudolf Conducts at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Shed at Tanglewood Friday night.

Hands-Off Leader

He showed himself to be a regulation, reliable, journeyman, hands-off leader who set the music in motion, kept it going and, for the most part, let it speak for itself.

He stood with a straight back and a stately manner and was economical and businesslike with his graphic instructions.

Perhaps it was because of this economy and perhaps it was because of the somewhat deliberate speeds he set, but there was an impression that he was directing his attention toward the music rather than the musicians.

One result was that the famed virtuosity of Boston's orchestra had ample space for display. Not only were the fiddlers' arms moving simultaneously, but also the exactness of the ensemble unity was nearly unbelievable.

Accuracy Surpassed

Even considering the orchestra's normal high standard of exactness, that accuracy was surpassed during Beethoven's Second Symphony, which followed Smetana's symphonic poem "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," before intermission.

The Smetana piece, written to portray the people and geography of his native land, Czechoslovakia, is music of varying moods, all pleasant.

The dynamics of the Beethoven symphony were confined to exclude the extremes of loudness and softness, but within those limits there was constant, subtle and sensitive change.

This shifting of emphasis kept the symphony from monotony in spite of the volume limits at the top and bottom and the generally pedestrian tempos. (The fourth movement was up to a speed more commonly expected).

Strauss, Stravinsky

After intermission the program offered Richard Strauss' first tone poem, "Macbeth" and Stravinsky's suite from the "Firebird" ballet. The Strauss tone poem was written when the composer was still full of musical ginger and, in spite of the title, before he began to try to recreate profound philosophical ideas in orchestral sound. Consequently, the piece has some of the brilliant color of the Stravinsky suite.

Both use the full complement of symphonic instruments, and even though the Strauss was written to sound thicker than the Stravinsky, it had much of the same sort of gleam and glitter Friday night.

The chill of the afternoon didn't frighten away all the possible listeners. There were [illegible] in warm coats and blankets and in at least one case, mittens. The temperature was [illegible]

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
AUG 20 1964

TANGLEWOOD REVIEWED

Friday Evening
By J.W.H.

Equipped with coats, sweaters and Aunt Abigail's steamer rug, Tanglewood proved a pleasant, if routine, evening on Friday. Max Rudolf was on from Cincinnati to conduct the Boston Symphony in a program consisting of: Smetana's Symphonic poem, From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows, Beethoven's Second Symphony, Strauss' Tone Poem Macbeth, and Stravinsky's Fire Bird Suite.

During much of the program, Maestro Rudolf conducted much as I lead the hi-fi, with complete confidence in his instrument barring a power failure. At a few dramatic moments in the Strauss, he pulled himself and the orchestra together to create a resounding climax, indicating that he was in charge after all.

While neither the Smetana nor the Strauss are frequently heard, they are so decidedly in the style and tonality of their creators that they were obviously "kissing kin" of old friends. One could play, "Do you know," with passage after passage in them, and they presented no problems for either orchestra or listener.

The Stravinsky once more reminded us that the Boston not only has fine strings, but also a superb woodwind section, in which each instrumentalist is a first-rank artist in his, or her, own right. The Beethoven was good Beethoven, which I bet the Bostonians could have played even with a power failure.

Saturday Evening
By A. C. Sly

It was cold at Tanglewood Saturday night. People were dressed in furs, sweaters and blankets. Perhaps that is why Erich Leinsdorf took a while warming to his program. Wagner's Prelude to Tristan and Isolde, one of the warmest scores to emerge from the 19th Century, was given the most sexless reading this reviewer has heard.

A new work, Study for Orchestra No. 2, by William Sydeman, received its first Festival performance. It is in one movement with four sections of varying tempo. In spite of its contemporary vocabulary, it has an immediate appeal with interesting timbres and rhythms.

Lorin Hollander was soloist in the Richard Strauss Burleske in D Minor. This is a show piece for both the pianist and the orchestra, especially the tympanist, and allows ample opportunity to display both bravura and lyric playing. Young Mr. Hollander proved to be a master of both. His is a tremendous talent, and he provided some of the most exciting piano playing of the summer.

Mendelssohn's Overture and Incidental Music to A Midsummer Night's Dream was probably planned for a warmer occasion, but it came off beautifully. Patricia Peardon as narrator, set the scene both visually and vocally. Helen Boatwright and June Genovese handled their brief solos gracefully, and the women's chorus added their magic to this delightful presentation.

Sunday Afternoon
By A. C. Sly

Seiji Ozawa was a student at the Berkshire Music Center in 1960. He appeared as guest conductor of the BSO Sunday afternoon. In the interim, he has conducted in Europe, Canada, and the U.S., and is music director of the Ravinia Festival in Chicago and assistant conductor of the N.Y. Philharmonic.

This is quite an undertaking for a 28-year-old musician, and this afternoon he demonstrated why he has been so chosen. His program enabled him to show his prowess with a "classic" type of symphony, a tone poem of the impressionist school, and a contemporary work.

The symphony was that of the young Bizet, in C major, a tuneful, unpretentious work. Mr. Ozawa took it at a good clip, but with a tight rein, keeping everything in proper perspective. The contemporary work was the Symphony (actually three orchestral excerpts) from Hindemith's Mathis der Maler. It is one of the late composer's more popular scores, and one with which the conductor obviously feels at home.

The Moussorgsky/Ravel Pictures at an Exhibition, with its ever-changing moods, gave the greatest challenge. Mr. Ozawa seemed to relish the opportunity, and gave a dazzling reading. He is a sensitive musician with a clear and decisive conducting technique.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
AUG 17 1964

At Tanglewood

Ozawa Given Accolade By Orchestra, Audience

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

Seiji Ozawa (rhymes with tower), a 28-year-old product of Toho School of Music in Tokyo, is today a world famous Japanese conductor. Tomorrow he might well become the most famous.

In 1960 he was a student conductor at Tanglewood and he has since then conducted orchestras in Japan, France, Germany, Canada and the U.S.A. He is assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic and now music director of the Ravinia Festival in Illinois.

Vital Tiger

Belieing the appearance of a wraith-like teenager yeah-yeahing the Beatles, this vital tiger evoked more bazazz from the BSO than has been heard in far too long a time.

The not-so-original Bizet symphony in C is never a bonfire, but in Ozawa's hands it was not only crisp and clean, it was warm and witty as well. Hindemith's Symphony "Matthias the Painter," while not program music, is a composer's version of a painter's version of the church's version of religious history. Mr. Ozawa makes the complex, almost awkward and somewhat unimaginative score take on the shape of expressive power and elevation. The impression of musical "views" is usually left to such as Debussy and Ravel, since Germanic approaches via the scholastic theme and development forms generally tend to avoid any visual affinity. When Hindemith's work is in concept less sympathetically produced, it lacks some grace, humility and polish and at best becomes proper, honest and straightforward.

Other Offerings

The other pictures in exhibition on Ozawa's program were Moussorgsky's. Maurice Ravel orchestrated this marvelous piano work for a Koussevitsky concert in Paris in 1923. Those who have claimed the music suffered with the change would likely complain very little at this performance for the brilliance and accent of the self-disciplined composer seemed neither exaggerated nor mitigated from the original. The cattle lumbered without miring, the chicks chattered without losing their heads and Goldberg and Schmuyle were never more realistic conversants. And who would have felt that the final scene, "The Great Gate at Kiev," could ever have promoted on piano the massive old heroic columned arch as it was here produced with Ozawa and the BSO.

The orchestra which respects and admires this young conductor applauded his down-to-earth genius with frank appreciation, but the audience acted as though he brought the only warmth to the weekend's weather.

Friday and Saturday were not nights for outdoor concerts. However, Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra, warmed up at least a portion of Friday's events with Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" Suite. Mr. Rudolf is a conservative and precise musician who, like Leinsdorf, shapes the smallest detail with [illegible] fic care. Smetana's Symphonic Poem from "Bohemia's Forests and Meadows" under such discipline emits more nationalistic character than scent of flowers. Beethoven's Second Symphony appears courageous in a beautiful way and in turn provokes light with mild gaiety. However, though Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" seems to get off the ground because the music won't allow anything else, Mr. Rudolf's reserved prods and boosts elevated the bird to an unaccustomed altitude.

Mr. Leinsdorf repeated last season's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture by Mendelssohn. Though the work was an outstanding success last year, perhaps this was due to its novelty, for this weekend it seemed with its cute, coy and smiling ways a bit too saccharine to be quite as sweet or as engaging.

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
AUG 17 1964

Ozawa Excels As Replacement For Monteux

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Seiji Ozawa is a little man with a giant's idea about music. And he drew a giant's worth of applause from 7264 listeners at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon.

Replaces Monteux

He was invited to replace Pierre Monteux, who died July 1, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and proved to be a noble choice.

Ozawa is only 28, short, slight, has a head that seems too big for his body, gleaming black hair, an infectious grin, an authoritative manner with the orchestra and a self-effacing manner with the audience.

He presented a program of Bizet's Symphony in C Major, Hindemiths symphony called "Mathis Der Maler" and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Mozart-Schubert Tones

The Bizet symphony began as if it were written by Mozart and continued to sound like that all during the first movement. During the second, a wonderfully lyric movement with a beautiful oboe solo, it sounded as if it had a lot of Schubert in it.

In both cases the similarity was all to the good because that's a pretty good way for this symphony to sound. And the rest of it was clipped, clean, and bouyant.

Ozawa led it with a bouncy and frisky manner, like the music, and seemed to be responding to the mood as well as leading it.

Manner Changes

The manner changed with the arrival of Hindemith. It became, like the music, deadly serious. Ozawa was no longer a little boy playing a game. He was all business, the boss.

The crispness of his manner and the orchestra's normal precision was a great help to the Hindemith, which sometimes is allowed to become muddy. It was as bright as Sunday's sunshine.

The bounce in the manner as well as the music came back after intermission with Moussorgsky's "Pictures." This famed sequence of sound pictures of paintings was presented with a modicum of exaggeration.

Vastly Entertaining

The first picture, for instance is of a dwarf. It is called "Gnomus" and all of its musical eccentricities were fully exploited by Ozawa. It was almost grotesque. And the second picture was so smoothly quiet as to be sleepy. The emphasis on the bright colors in the "Pictures" was, in this case, refreshing. Ozawa carried the music to the brink of burlesque, but it didn't go over. It was, instead, vastly entertaining.

After so many days of frigidity, the warm sun brought many picnickers to the lawns. There seemed to be as many on the grass as in the giant shed, which can accommodate 6037, and they were lolling in the sun as far as 700 feet from the stage.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,678
AUG 17 1964

Leinsdorf Mastery on Display at Tanglewood

LORIN HOLLANDER

By DANIEL L. CUSICK

Whatever fine music may come from the Boston Symphony under the baton of guest conductors, there is no doubt that the orchestra is the child of Erich Leinsdorf. Perfect proof of that came Saturday night at Tanglewood when Leinsdorf took to the stand to conduct.

From the first notes of the "Prelude to Tristan and Isolde," by Wagner, the familiar sound was there to bear witness to the unique collaboration between the conductor and the men of the ensemble.

Wagner's music speaks well enough for itself but with Leinsdorf at the helm, his command of German music a strong point to his favor, the playing was sonorous and had warmth and beauty of line that was a pleasure to hear.

★ ★ ★

WILLIAM SYDEMAN'S "Study for Orchestra No. 2" received its Tanglewood premiere at the Saturday concert. There were moments of real creativity in the work, but toward the finale the composer began to stretch a point which should have been stated and let go.

In four segments, the "Study" was in the modern harmonic idiom and made fine use of the orchestral forces. The problem was that the few statements of interest did not justify the extended treatment they were given. Rather than simplifying to show off these interesting moments, Sydeman chose to belabor the thing and came up with what amounts to a mediocre work as a result.

Lorin Hollander was the piano soloist for the "Burleske" of Richard Strauss. Like the Sydeman work, the "Burleske" is not a great piece of music but it does provide a virtuoso vehicle for the soloist.

★ ★ ★

HOLLANDER was suited excellently to take the role of virtuoso in hand. He is a strong pianist with a somewhat dry and percussive style, but he can draw roaring sounds from his instrument which bedazzle the ear.

The "Burleske" is a dialogue between tympani and piano, written with not the least attempt to hide the sarcastic wit involved in the interplay of the instruments. It is a slightly madcap piece which allows for great interpretative latitude on the parts of the conductor and soloist. Because these liberties were taken, the performance became one of good humored collaboration.

The closing number, Mendelssohn's "Incidental Music to a Midsummer Night's Dream," had Helen Boatwright, June Genovese and Patricia Peardon soloing with the orchestra and the Tanglewood Choir in an impressive and lovely reading of the fantastic story.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
AUG 20 1964

TANGLEWOOD REVIEWED

Friday Evening
By J.W.H.

Equipped with coats, sweaters and Aunt Abigail's steamer rug, Tanglewood proved a pleasant, if routine, evening on Friday. Max Rudolf was on from Cincinnati to conduct the Boston Symphony in a program consisting of: Smetana's Symphonic poem, From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows, Beethoven's Second Symphony, Strauss' Tone Poem Macbeth, and Stravinsky's Fire Bird Suite.

During much of the program, Maestro Rudolf conducted much as I lead the hi-fi, with complete confidence in his instrument barring a power failure. At a few dramatic moments in the Strauss, he pulled himself and the orchestra together to create a resounding climax, indicating that he was in charge after all.

While neither the Smetana nor the Strauss are frequently heard, they are so decidedly in the style and tonality of their creators that they were obviously "kissing kin" of old friends. One could play, "Do you know," with passage after passage in them, and they presented no problems for either orchestra or listener.

The Stravinsky once more reminded us that the Boston not only has fine strings, but also a superb woodwind section, in which each instrumentalist is a first-rank artist in his, or her, own right. The Beethoven was good Beethoven, which I bet the Bostonians could have played even with a power failure.

Saturday Evening
By A. C. Sly

It was cold at Tanglewood Saturday night. People were dressed in furs, sweaters and blankets. Perhaps that is why Erich Leinsdorf took a while warming to his program. Wagner's Prelude to Tristan and Isolde, one of the warmest scores to emerge from the 19th Century, was given the most sexless reading this reviewer has heard.

A new work, Study for Orchestra No. 2, by William Sydeman, received its first Festival performance. It is in one movement with four sections of varying tempo. In spite of its contemporary vocabulary, it has an immediate appeal with interesting timbres and rhythms.

Lorin Hollander was soloist in the Richard Strauss Burleske in D Minor. This is a show piece for both the pianist and the orchestra, especially the tympanist, and allows ample opportunity to display both bravura and lyric playing. Young Mr. Hollander proved to be a master of both. His is a tremendous talent, and he provided some of the most exciting piano playing of the summer.

Mendelssohn's Overture and Incidental Music to A Midsummer Night's Dream was probably planned for a warmer occasion, but it came off beautifully. Patricia Peardon as narrator, set the scene both visually and vocally. Helen Boatwright and June Genovese handled their brief solos gracefully, and the women's chorus added their magic to the delightful presentation.

Sunday Afternoon
By A. C. Sly

Seiji Ozawa was a student at the Berkshire Music Center in 1960. He appeared as guest conductor of the BSO Sunday afternoon. In the interim, he has conducted in Europe, Canada, and the U.S., and is music director of the Ravinia Festival in Chicago and assistant conductor of the N.Y. Philharmonic.

This is quite an undertaking for a 28-year-old musician, and this afternoon he demonstrated why he has been so chosen. His program enabled him to show his prowess with a "classic" type of symphony, a tone poem of the impressionist school, and a contemporary work.

The symphony was that of the young Bizet, in C major, a tuneful, unpretentious work. Mr. Ozawa took it at a good clip, but with a tight rein, keeping everything in proper perspective. The contemporary work was the Symphony (actually three orchestral excerpts) from Hindemith's Mathis der Maler. It is one of the late composer's more popular scores, and one with which the conductor obviously feels at home.

The Moussorgsky/Ravel Pictures at an Exhibition, with its ever-changing moods, gave the greatest challenge. Mr. Ozawa seemed to relish the opportunity, and gave a dazzling reading. He is a sensitive musician with a clear and decisive conducting technique.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
AUG 17 1964

At Tanglewood

Ozawa Given Accolade By Orchestra, Audience

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

Seiji Ozawa (rhymes with tower), a 28-year-old product of Toho School of Music in Tokyo, is today a world famous Japanese conductor. Tomorrow he might well become the most famous.

In 1960 he was a student conductor at Tanglewood and he has since then conducted orchestras in Japan, France, Germany, Canada and the U.S.A. He is assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic and now music director of the Ravinia Festival in Illinois.

Vital Tiger

Belieing the appearance of a wraith-like teenager yeah-yeahing the Beatles, this vital tiger evoked more bazazz from the BSO than has been heard in far too long a time.

The not-so-original Bizet symphony in C is never a bonfire, but in Ozawa's hands it was not only crisp and clean, it was warm and witty as well. Hindemith's Symphony "Matthias the Painter," while not program music, is a composer's version of a painter's version of the church's version of religious history. Mr. Ozawa makes the complex, almost awkward and somewhat unimaginative score take on the shape of expressive power and elevation. The impression of musical "views" is usually left to such as Debussy and Ravel, since Germanic approaches via the scholastic theme and development forms generally tend to avoid any visual affinity. When Hindemith's work is in concept less sympathetically produced, it lacks some grace, humility and polish and at best becomes proper, honest and straightforward.

Other Offerings

The other pictures in exhibition on Ozawa's program were Moussorgsky's. Maurice Ravel orchestrated this marvelous piano work for a Koussevitsky concert in Paris in 1922. Those who have claimed the music suffered with the change would likely complain very little at this performance for the brilliance and accent of the self-disciplined composer seemed neither exaggerated nor mitigated from the original. The cattle lumbered without miring, the chicks chattered without losing their heads and Goldberg and Schmuyle were never more realistic conversants. And who would have felt that the final scene, "The Great Gate at Kiev," could ever have promoted on piano the massive old heroic columned arch as it was here produced with Ozawa and the BSO.

The orchestra which respects and admires this young conductor applauded his down-to-earth genius with frank appreciation, but the audience acted as though he brought the only warmth to the weekend's weather.

Friday and Saturday were not nights for outdoor concerts. However, Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra, warmed up at least a portion of Friday's events with Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" Suite. Mr. Rudolf is a conservative and precise musician who, like Leinsdorf, shapes the smallest detail with [illegible] fic care. Smetana's Symphonic Poem from "Bohemia's Forests and Meadows" under such discipline emits more nationalistic character than scent of flowers. Beethoven's Second Symphony appears courageous in a beautiful way and in turn provokes light with mild gaiety. However, though Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" seems to get off the ground because the music won't allow anything else, Mr. Rudolf's reserved prods and boosts elevated the bird to an unaccustomed altitude.

Mr. Leinsdorf repeated last season's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture by Mendelssohn. Though the work was an outstanding success last year, perhaps this was due to its novelty, for this weekend it seemed with its cute, coy and smiling ways a bit too saccharine to be quite as sweet or as engaging.

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
AUG 17 1964

Ozawa Excels As Replacement For Monteux

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Seiji Ozawa is a little man with a giant's idea about music. And he drew a giant's worth of applause from 7264 listeners at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon.

Replaces Monteux

He was invited to replace Pierre Monteux, who died July 1, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and proved to be a noble choice.

Ozawa is only 28, short, slight, has a head that seems too big for his body, gleaming black hair, an infectious grin, an authoritative manner with the orchestra and a self-effacing manner with the audience.

He presented a program of Bizet's Symphony in C Major, Hindemiths symphony called "Mathis Der Maler" and Mousorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Mozart-Schubert Tones

The Bizet symphony began as if it were written by Mozart and continued to sound like that all during the first movement. During the second, a wonderfully lyric movement with a beautiful oboe solo, it sounded as if it had a lot of Schubert in it.

In both cases the similarity was all to the good because that's a pretty good way for this symphony to sound. And the rest of it was clipped, clean, and bouyant.

Ozawa led it with a bouncy and frisky manner, like the music, and seemed to be responding to the mood as well as leading it.

Manner Changes

The manner changed with the arrival of Hindemith. It became, like the music, deadly serious. Ozawa was no longer a little boy playing a game. He was all business, the boss.

The crispness of his manner and the orchestra's normal precision was a great help to the Hindemith, which sometimes is allowed to become muddy. It was as bright as Sunday's sunshine.

The bounce in the manner as well as the music came back after intermission with Moussorgsky's "Pictures." This famed sequence of sound pictures of paintings was presented with a modicum of exaggeration.

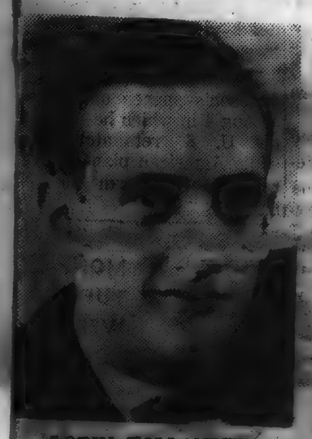
Vastly Entertaining

The first picture, for instance is of a dwarf. It is called "Gnomus" and all of its musical eccentricities were fully exploited by Ozawa. It was almost grotesque. And the second picture was so smoothly quiet as to be sleepy. The emphasis on the bright colors in the "Pictures" was, in this case, refreshing. Ozawa carried the music to the brink of burlesque, but it didn't go over. It was, instead, vastly entertaining.

After so many days of frigidity, the warm sun brought many picnickers to the lawns. There seemed to be as many on the grass as in the giant shed, which can accommodate 6037, and they were lolling in the sun as far as 700 feet from the stage.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,678
AUG 17 1964

Leinsdorf Mastery on Display at Tanglewood



LORIN HOLLANDER

By DANIEL L. CUSICK

Whatever fine music may come from the Boston Symphony under the baton of guest conductors, there is no doubt that the orchestra is the child of Erich Leinsdorf. Perfect proof of that came Saturday night at Tanglewood when Leinsdorf took to the stand to conduct.

From the first notes of the "Prelude to Tristan and Isolde," by Wagner, the familiar sound was there to bear witness to the unique collaboration between the conductor and the men of the ensemble.

Wagner's music speaks well enough for itself but with Leinsdorf at the helm, his command of German music a strong point to his favor, the playing was sonorous and had warmth and beauty of line that was a pleasure to hear.

★ ★ ★

WILLIAM SYDEMAN'S "Study for Orchestra No. 2" received its Tanglewood premiere at the Saturday concert. There were moments of real creativity in the work, but toward the finale the composer began to stretch a point which should have been stated and let go.

In four segments, the "Study" was in the modern harmonic idiom and made fine use of the orchestral forces. The problem was that the few statements of interest did not justify the extended treatment they were given. Rather than simplifying to show off these interesting moments, Sydeman chose to belabor the thing and came up with what amounts to a mediocre work as a result.

Lorin Hollander was the piano soloist for the "Burleske" of Richard Strauss. Like the Sydeman work, the "Burleske" is not a great piece of music but it does provide a virtuoso vehicle for the soloist.

★ ★ ★

HOLLANDER was suited excellently to take the role of virtuoso in hand. He is a strong pianist with a somewhat dry and percussive style, but he can draw roaring sounds from his instrument which bedazzle the ear.

The "Burleske" is a dialogue between tympani and piano, written with not the least attempt to hide the sarcastic wit involved in the interplay of the instruments. It is a slightly madcap piece which allows for great interpretative latitude on the parts of the conductor and soloist. Because these liberties were taken, the performance became one of good humored collaboration.

The closing number, Mendelssohn's "Incidental Music to a Midsummer Night's Dream," had Helen Boatwright, June Genovese and Patricia Peardon soloing with the orchestra and the Tanglewood Choir in an impressive and lovely reading of the fantastic story.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711

AUG 17 1964

At Lenox

Enjoyable Ozawa Concert

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX—Seiji Ozawa, who is the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood on Sunday afternoon, is a good conductor. He is very likely better than even if we were to say he is good: He is good-looking, elegant, very young, and in every way desirable.

Also, it would be useless to pretend that being a conductor is anything other than a difficult trade. He is, happily, intelligent, musical, and at 28 he already knows plenty about orchestras and how they work. Clearly, Ozawa is in the right profession.

He came here to conduct a concert scheduled for the late Pierre Monteux, and he took over Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" and the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Picture at an Exhibition" from the program that had been originally planned. Monteux had put Salome's Dance on the program, but Ozawa substituted the Bizet symphony.

The Bizet came off really superbly. Everything Ozawa does is alive with good rhythm, with light, subtle and varied accentuation. He is also exceptionally good with lyric melody: the second themes in the allegros and the big string tune in the adagio really soared as things rarely seem to around here.

"Mathis" makes greater demands on the interpreter, and the performance revealed things that at this point are still problems for Ozawa. It is difficult for him to be intense without also being loud; conversely, in the passages where Hindemith asks that the music become more tranquil, Ozawa sometimes succeeded only in becoming a little slower. The finale, with its free recitatives and its many tempo changes, is notoriously difficult, and a few of its trickier spots momentarily defeated him.

In the Ravel orchestration of Mussorgsky's amazing piano pieces, the problem spots were apt to be technical rather than musical, with a few bad moments at transitions and changes. There were a few unconventional ideas about tempi: "Tuileries" for example was rather slow, which was not bad in itself though not quite right in relation to the preceeding promenade. Also, the effect was slightly jeopardized by the fact that a few of the wind players were going along at tempi they remembered from previous performances.

There were some other spots of bad luck with the orchestra—notably some less than first class solos in "the Old Castle" and "Bydlo"—but in general the playing was notably good. Ozawa seems not to commit himself deeply in his interpretations, but then the program was of a kind that gave him little opportunity in this direction. He is obviously tremendously gifted, very capable as well, and the concert was fresh and unusually enjoyable.

The best new music of the week-end was by Richard Wagner. On Saturday night Erich Leinsdorf conducted the prelude to "Tristan," for once not coupling it to the "Liebestod" but using Wagner's own concert ending. That, as a matter of fact, uses material from the Liebestod, rethought and recomposed beautifully, with a delicate fragrance of coloring that evokes the second act duet. It is the kind of music to give one some pause about the butcheries by other people that normally pass for Wagnerian concert endings, and I am in every way grateful to Mr. Leinsdorf for his revival of a few pages of Wagner's ripest music, music that I imagine few had ever heard before.

Leinsdorf also repeated from the main season's programs William Sydeman's "Study for Orchestra No. 2." It is facile music, easy to play and to conduct (though some of the performance was an unholy mess), just fashionably modern enough to make performers and audiences feel smug for their charity in condescending to the 20th century, cliche-ridden enough so that it gives no one any trouble as a disturbing and genuinely modern experience might.

Short of excellence, I hear in Mr. Sydeman's work every quality that should make it out for considerable public success.

Saturday's program also contained Richard Strauss' charming "Bulesk," played in rather ordinary fashion by Lorin Hollander, and the Mendelssohn incidental music to "The Winter's Tale"—pardon me, "Midsummer Night's Dream"—with Patricia Pardon, narrator, Helen Boatwright, soprano, June Genovese, mezzo-soprano, and the Tanglewood Choir prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon.

WORCESTER, MASS.
Sunday Telegram
Sun. Circ. 102,435

AUG 16 1964

Music: 'Tristan and Isolde' At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Last night's glowing performance at Tanglewood of the "Tristan and Isolde" prelude was pretty strong evidence that Wagner's music is becoming a specialty of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf's direction.

An audience of 7,908 attended the second concert of the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh weekend.

First Tanglewood performances were Sydeman's Second Study for Orchestra and Richard Strauss' Piano Concerto, "Burleske," with Lorin Hollander as soloist. Largest work was a repeat from last summer — the complete score of Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." For the latter, the Tanglewood choir had been prepared by Lorna Cooke De Varon. Soloist were Helen Boatwright, soprano, June Genovese, mezzo - soprano, Patricia Peardon was narrator.

Poignant Theatrics

If one knew nothing of the poignant theatrics which are mirrored in Wagner's opera, "Tristan," last night's sounds would still have soared on an ethereal plane.

Even the visible drama might have been subordinated to the panorama of brilliant and soft coloration.

Only a great orchestra could have fulfilled Leinsdorf's intense, yet sensitive resume of the fateful love sotry.

The gradual, long crescendo built to a mighty crisis, and the recession to whispered sound was as controlled playing as we have heard at Tanglewood this summer. The "Love potion" theme was richly addressed by cellos and oboes. The "Love Glance" theme in cellos was voluptuous.

Composer Teaches Music

Sydeman's Orchestral Study had special significance last night. It was written three years after the composer completed two summers' study at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, in 1956. He is now teaching at the Mannes College of Music in Manhattan.

His work was cordially received. Sydeman was on hand to acknowledge the applause.

Orchestral study opens with strands of melody shared by woodwinds and low strings. Outbursts happen frequently between atmospheric, mysterious matter. Brusk and vigorous rhythms activate the scene.

Leinsdorf brought order into this chaotic melange by maintaining continuity, and setting a wide margin between melodic foregrounds and whatever supported them.

Hollander made an excellent synchronization of virile rhythms as they moved within and between solo instruments and orchestra.

Contained Air of Bravura

The performance had an air of bravura. Hollander demonstrated dexterous technique in brilliant passages, but also took time and care to make his instrument sing in poetic areas.

Traces of haste appeared in spots, but not enough to mar a neat structure or to cause disorder. The pianist tastefully avoided any semblance of sentimentality, although he sometimes is prone to become demonstrative.

The playing was technically clean - cut, at times reaching a dazzling state.

Worcester's Representative

Worcester singer Malama Providakes makes her third appearance this morning as contralto soloist in the Berkshire Music Center's series, "Music of Johann Sebastian Bach."

Under the direction of Seymour Lipkin she will participate in Cantata No. 53, "Schlage Doch Gewunschte Stunde" and Cantata No. 147, "Herz Und Mund Und That Und Leben."

These valuable programs, attended by members of the center and friends, combine instrumental and vocal music. Directors are Lipkin, Paul Ulanowsky, Igor Kipnis and Melvin Strauss.

This afternoon's festival concert marks the debut of Eiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood. Four years ago he studied at the Berkshire Center under the Koussevitzky Memorial scholarship. He is now assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

Today's program: Bizet's symphony in C Major, Hindemith's symphony, "Mathis De Maler," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," in the Ravel transcription.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

AUG 17 1964

Music: Lenox Weekend

Leinsdorf and Ozawa Conduct Concerts by Boston Symphony at Tanglewood

By HOWARD KLEIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 16—The seventh weekend of music at Tanglewood started with two splendid concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night, Erich Leinsdorf led a program of strong and, for the most part, unusual works. This afternoon, Seiji Ozawa conducted a virtuoso concert of standard works that was brilliant in every way.

Mr. Leinsdorf's concert had one old chestnut, the prelude to "Tristan und Isolde," and it was given a rich, expansive reading. Lorin Hollander was piano soloist in Strauss's delightful "Burleske in D Minor for Piano and Orchestra" and his playing confirmed the impression that he is the leading pianist of his generation.

•

In previous performances Mr. Hollander has shown his complete pianism in handling bravura playing. He can play fast, loud, and accurately—in short, no technical demands are too great. But the "Burleske" calls for warm Viennese sentimentality as well as a sturdy technique, and Mr. Hollander's pliable tone, ingratiating rhythmic swing and general sensitivity showed he commands a lyrical as well as a virile expression.

There was humor in the way he underlined the obvious quote from "Tristan" that pops up in the cadenza too. What more is there to ask from a pianist?

William Sydeman, one of the 10 composers whose work formed the 5-day Festival of Contemporary American Music here last week, was given a place on this program with his "Study for Orchestra No. 2." Mr. Sydeman, a 36-year-old New Yorker, is the only avant-garde composer who has been included on these concerts, and the word is that Mr. Leinsdorf is very interested in a work Mr. Sydeman is writing now.

The "Study" is just that—a study. It essays no profound statement but it does make its point musically as well as instrumentally. There is a quiet opening, a vigorous working out, interspersed with tranquil sections, and a quiet close.

Solos proliferate and the piece unwinds slowly from a high point. The music seemed to be acceptable to the public. Mr. Sydeman was helped on stage by Mr. Leinsdorf to share bows with the conductor and orchestra.

Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the other work, is a miracle of its kind. It is as good as anything he ever wrote and it was created when he was only 17 years old. Patricia Peardon spoke excerpts that were made by Mr. Leinsdorf to go with the 10 sections. Helen Boatwright was soprano soloist and June Genovese, mezzo-soprano.

The Tanglewood Choir participated, and the general effect was quite charming. The string tone was a bit heavy and the playing could have been more precisely together, but only a purist would have objected to the performance.

For his programing and leading, Mr. Leinsdorf deserves thanks.

If Mr. Ozawa's conducting was typical, New York Philharmonic audiences may have a treat in store for them. The 28-year-old Japanese conductor will be the Philharmonic's assistant this year. Only four years ago he was a student here and, besides his Philharmonic post, he is music director of the Ravinia Festival of Chicago.

He is a choreographic conductor, similar in style to Leonard Bernstein, and, like Mr. Bernstein, he is extremely musical, sensitive and has a vibrant personality. He has complete command of the orchestra.

He led three works, Bizet's Symphony in C, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," and Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the Ravel orchestration.

•

He drew long applause and bravos with each reading for the vigor and precision that characterized his work.

If there is a criticism it is that Mr. Ozawa, like many young conductors, tends to be too tight in lyrical music. But in time the relaxation that will let the music truly sing may come.

Something is always going on at the Berkshire Music Center and this week will be no exception. Tonight and tomorrow a string symposium is being held that will look into the problems of orchestras lacking competent string players. A symposium of this kind was held here last year.

The panelists will include Richard Burgin, Louis Krasner, Joseph Knitzer, Max Kaplan, Sheppard Lehnoff, Sidney Harth, Howard Boatwright, Samuel Applebaum, William Kroll, Joseph Silverstein and Isaac Ginzpld.

107

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Sunday Republican
Sun. Circ. 114,397

AUG 16 1964

MENDELSSOHN'S STYLE PREVAILS AT TANGLEWOOD

'Burleske' of Strauss Part Of Symphony's Shed Program

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Mendelssohn topped a medley of widely diverse musical styles on the program chosen by Erich Leinsdorf for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its guest artists Saturday night in the great shed at Tanglewood.

"Burleske' Sparkles

There was the lyrical prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," which opened the program, Sydeman's Contemporary Study for Orchestra No. 2 and the sparkling "Burleske' for piano and orchestra, written by Richard Strauss when he was 21, only a year old than Lorin Hollander, who played it Saturday.

Mendelssohn's complete incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" filled the space after intermission with pure enchantment, just as it did in the same place a year ago with almost the same cast.

Patricia Peardon, Shakespearean actress at Stratford, Conn., repeated her role as chief fair princess and narrator of excerpts chosen from the play by Leinsdorf to be read between the movements of music.

June Genovese returned with her warm mezzo-soprano, and Helen Boatwright sang the soprano part sung last year by Jeanette Scovotti. They stood at the rear of the orchestra with 44 women from the Tanglewood Choir. The orchestra, at full strength, played with the lightfootedness of elves and hobgoblins.

Seldom Repeated

Music is a subjective matter, and it is seldom that a long moment of magical enchantment can be repeated exactly in the same person by the same sounds.

That was the feeling generated by this music in this place in this listener a year ago, and the response Saturday night, in spite of the repetition, was nearly the same. It was close enough to hope that most of those who heard it this time had much the same response.

The two works that followed the Wagner prelude before intermission offered nearly the same degree of interest.

Hollander stole the hearts of the audience with an exuberant, almost reckless, performance of the solo part in the Strauss "Berleske" for piano and orchestra. It seemed to be a work specially written for his talents, sparkling brilliance, lightning speed and youthful vigor.

Display Piece

It presents sections of fiendish difficulty and vitality alternating with tranquil, nocturnal passages puts the pianist securely in front of the orchestra and is frankly a theatrical display piece.

But it is fun rather than acrobatic, and, as usual, brought a tremendous response from the listeners. It was preceded by Sydeman's 12 minute "Study," a contemporary work that includes passages of nearly traditional calm along with those of crashing dissonance and the fragmented pointillism of the avant garde.

There are lean, Quixotic solos backed by a curtain of steady sheen from the high strings. It ends with a long plaintive melody from a lonely flute weaving among soft, plucked chords.

Many Surprises

There is great variety in the piece, many tonal colors and many musical surprises. It deserves frequent repetition. The whole program had great variety, perhaps more than any of the festival's preceding programs. But that was only one reason accounting for its superiority.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

WORCESTER, MASS.
Telegram
Morn. Circ. 58,744

AUG 17 1964

Music: Japanese Conductor in Debut

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — It would have been difficult to contrive a more felicitous program than yesterday afternoon's with which Japanese conductor Seiji Ozawa made his Berkshire Music Festival debut at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday's attendance of 7,264 made the Festival's seventh weekend total 24,966.

This was not literally a Tanglewood "first" for Ozawa. In 1960 he was a member of the Berkshire Music Center's Composition Department under a Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship. He is currently assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic. The program: Bizet's Symphony in C Major, "Hindemith's Symphony, "Nathis Der Maler," and Moussorgsky Ravel's Pictures At an Exhibition." Ozawa "inherited" the Hindemith and Moussorgsky. They were to have been conducted by Pierre Monteux who died in July.

Tireless Conductor

Ozawa is short, lean, 28-years-old. His style midway between the conservative veteran and athletic newcomer. At Saturday morning's rehearsal he worked tirelessly and wouldn't let go until he had what he wanted. For example, he spent over an hour with the Hindemith which takes 24 minutes to play.

If one discards visual enchantment from the end result, Hindemith "Matthias" received and expert technical performance. All the prime requisites were there - solos forward positions, rich harmonic backgrounds in proper balance.

"Angelic concert and entombment" were lavished with pure nuances. In the latter were velvety sounds and exquisite solos. "Temptation of St. Anthony" made it's usual impact with feverish crescendos culminating in shattering chords and cymbal crashes. It also had moments of wringing beauty in strings.

Symphony Has Spontaneity

While Bizet's symphony is no "great shakes" as a full scale work, it does have an abundance of gaiety and charm. Also it oozes with the spontaniety of its 17-year-old composer.

Ozawa sought its effectiveness in technical dexterity which is matter-of-fact with the Boston Symphony, alive tempos and tonal sparkle.

The symphony is so indented with traces of Mozart, Beethoven, and even Rossini that Ozawa's ardent dedication actually gave it a status.

Horns Erratic

That is does not deserve.

All did not go well. The horns had a few misses with pitch.

Second movement went conspicuously well because of Ralph Gomberg's oboe solo and a neatly fugue in strings. Ozawa brought out the true folkish spirit of the third movement and added a touch of jubilance. The finale went at top speed with brilliant results.

"Tour D'Force was Moussorgsky - Ravel's "Exhibition paratures.' It's a conductors paradise. The work also provided the orchestra wtih opportunity to manifest its most striking qualities. It wasn't always clear who generated more excitement conductor or orchestra. At least, both seemed influenced by the same motivations. Ozaw offered a few argumentative opinions. For example, "Gnomes" was pretty choppy and forfeited some of its dramatic effect. The high - pitched trumpet solo in "Goldenberg and Schmyle" wasn't entirely accurate nor were all the notes played by Armando Ghitalla, and "Market Place at Limoges" lacked some of its sparkle because of curtailed speed.

Curtain Calls

There were other heavily compensating assets. Among them were the spotlessly played tuba solo by R. Vinal Smith, screaming, spine-chilling chords in "Catacombs," wit of the "Chicken Ballet" and splendor of "Great Gate at Kive. "Ozawa shared the glory by taking curtain calls.

What may prove to be Tanglewood's most spectacular concert of the summer will be Wednesday night. The Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras will combine (170 players) and a 200 - voice mixed chorus will give a "gala" for the Center's benefit.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Tchaikosky's Fourth Symphony; Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltzes (in its original version with male chorus) and the march from Wagner's "Tannhauser," with full cast.

Leopold Stokowski will conduct the combined orchestras in Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C Minor.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

WORCESTER, MASS.
Gazette
Eve. Circ. 92,729

AUG 17 1964

Ozawa Conducts at Tanglewood

By GEORGE W. STOWE
Times Music Critic

LENOX, Mass. —Seiji Ozawa, the young Japanese conductor who was the replacement for the late Pierre Monteux Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood, is an expert baton technician and an exciting personality on the podium.

For those unfamiliar with his background he is the conductor of the Toho Orchestra from Tokyo, an ensemble that drew rave reviews from the New York critics in its visit here. In addition, he has just been appointed assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. He should prove an artistic asset to our cultural milieu.

* * *

MR. OZAWA'S slim figure and his extreme youth (he looks considerably younger than his 28 years) did not prepare the audience for the authoritative manner of his leadership and the precision of his conducting. Although the Boston Symphony, I'm sure, could function efficiently without such detailed and accurate cues as he afforded the players, it was gratifying to see that he had complete control of the situation. Inasmuch as he did not use a score, his skills were particularly impressive.

In Bizet's ingratiating Smyphony in C the Boston players were a paragon of dulcet sound and cohesive musicianship. The tempi were brisk but the texture was always clear. Ralph Gomberg's oboe solos in the second movement were set forth with ravishing finesse, even though Mr. Ozawa was not one to sentimentalize over the music's melodic content.

* * *

HINDEMITH'S stature will rest on such solid accomplishments as his symphony "Mathis der Maler," if his name survives the erosion of time. It can be a very exciting score, as this young Japanese conductor proved Sunday afternoon. In fact, I have never heard the final movement — the "Temptation of St. Anthony" — set forth with such searing intensity as Mr. Ozawa drew from his orchestral players on this occasion.

Perhaps the performance was not in the best Germanic tradition in its impassioned utterance. Yet it went far to prove that Hindemith is not the dry and uninspired academician that so many people seem to consider him. It drew a deserved ovation for the orchestra and the conductor.

* * *

RAVEL'S masterly orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at Exhibition" was another fine showcase for the talents of the Bostonians under this young conductor. Although the transition from one movement to another was not always as smoothly achieved or as artfully contrived as it might have been, it was a performance full of excitement and color.

In fact, I can still hear, in my mind's ear, the beautiful horn and brass playing in "Catacombs," the surging vitality of "The Hut on Fowl's Legs," and the ringing sonority of "The Great Gate at Kiev." This was music - making that one could carry beyond the confines of the music shed at Lenox and store away in the memory indefinitely.

NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, August 17, 1964

T-U AT THE CONCERT

Ozawa Impressive As Berkshire Guest

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

Tanglewood—Rudyard Kipling to the contrary, the orient and the occident did "meet" auspiciously in the Tanglewood Music Shed yesterday afternoon when young Seiji Ozawa was the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proving that integration is possible through the medium of orchestral music. The tremendously talented musical director of the Ravinia Music Festival brought the seventh or penultimate series of weekend concerts to an exciting conclusion with his eastern heritage artistically merging with his impeccable interpretations of Hindemith, Moussorgsky and Richard Strauss.

Two birthdays were celebrated during the weekend series of major concerts: the 100th anniversary of the birth of Richard Strauss and the 400th observance of the natal year of Shakespeare, the latter being honored with a performance of "A Midsummer Nights Dream," by Mendelssohn, Saturday night under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

The other conductorial colleague of Mr. Leinsdorf was Max Rudolph, director of the Cincinnati Orchestra, in his first Tanglewood appearance as guest conductor Friday night. Mr. Rudolph also showed his musical versatility with the programming of the musical landscape, "From Bohemia's Forests"; "Beethoven's Symphony, No. 2," the pyrotechnical score of the "Firebird Suite" by Stravinsky and Strauss' setting of "Macbeth," a special candle lighted in honor of the Bard of Avon.

Saturday night Mr. Leinsdorf returned to his honored position as permanent conductor of the Bostonians, thoroughly exploring another "first" at Tanglewood with the use of Richard Strauss' descriptive musical canvas "Burlesque" in which the guest soloist was the young American pianist, Lorin Hollender, one of the new generation of technical and interpretative virtuosos, who created tremendous interest during his Tanglewood debut last season with the same enthusiasm that he aroused Saturday night. The Prelude to Act I of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Study for Orchestra, No. 2" by William Sydeman which received its world premiere by Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, last November, completed the program.

As the American Salzburg draws to a regretful conclusion, Mr. Leinsdorf has scheduled a gala concert for Wednesday night which will feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and chorus of 200 in the "Fourth Symphony" by Tchaikovsky; the "Blue Danube Waltzes" by Johann Strauss, in its original version with male chorus, and the March from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

Since the piece de resistance will be the appearance of Leopold Stokowski, former conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, who will conduct the "Passacaglia and Fugue" by Bach, using the two orchestras, it is suggested that those who have never attended any of the Berkshire Music Festivals take advantage of this outstanding package deal, available in our own cultural backyard, an hour's motor trip through the heart of the Berkshires. Reservations may be had by calling the box office, Lenox, Mass.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 128,545

AUG 17 1964

AT TANGLEWOOD

Seiji Ozawa, 28, Conducts Program

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Seiji Osawa, 28-year-old conductor, was the center of interest yesterday at Tanglewood.

Three years ago, as a member of the Berkshire Music Center's conducting department, he won the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship awarded to a young conductor of great merit. He was invited to take over yesterday's concert three months ago, when it became evident that Pierre Monteux would not again leave his sickbed.

Ozawa, assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and music director of the Ravinia Festival at Chicago, has led many orchestras in Japan, Europe and America.

In a colorful program of 19th and 20th century music, he was very much at home. The 7,264 listeners went wild over him.

Gazette Review

Bizet Symphony

Bizet's single symphony, in C major, a boyhood effort, is not great music in some respects but is lilting, agreeable material, and lent itself to the clear and sometimes eloquent treatment given it yesterday.

Though fugal moments of the "Adagio" seemed stilted, there was a fine flow of phrase and tone in the symphony as a whole.

Hindemith's Symphony, "Mathis der Maler" (Matthias the Painter), was far deeper fare, and received a glorious performance. The "Angelic Concert" found the conductor in alert control of its exuberance. "Entombment" was marvelously expressive and poignat, without a hint of mawkishness. The "Temptation of St. Anthony" brought exciting work for the strings, punctuated by Startling moments for the percussion. A noble episode for the hymnlike winds led into a thunderous climax.

Moussorgsky

Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibtion," in the Ravel orchestral arrangement, proved at all times delightful. Each picture had a fantastic degree of individuality. The children in the Tuileries seemed more calm than usual, but the market women at Limoges worked up an amusing storm. The tense, exact phrasings of the "Gnome" contrasted well with the twittering chicks.

Drums and brass on alternate beats did stunning things with the opening of "The Hut on Fowl's Legs." "The Great Gate at Kiev" went through so many struggles of intensity that the finale "couldn't possibly be bigger," but it was, and the answering applause was scarcely less thunderous in its way.

TIGHT BINDING

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

109

Music Review

Weekend Concerts at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Whitestone

Conductor Seiji Ozawa receives plaudits of the audience

THE CONCERT at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon, the last of the seventh and penultimate weekend of the Berkshire Festival season, was conducted by a gifted young guest from Japan, Seiji Ozawa. He played the Bizet C Major Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" and the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Ozawa, small in stature and unequivocal in his artistic demands, gave an audience of 7,204 ecstatic pleasure. We have had a run of music inspired by pictures this season, starting with Klee a week ago and yesterday with Grunewald and Hartmann. Each composer has his own preferences of how he would convey graphic images in fleeting notes. Moussorgsky chose the most obvious way. He attempted to depict the subjects of Hartmann's picture by near-translation. Hindemith tried to catch the spirit of the symbolism of his own opera from which the three movements are extracted to make an orchestral symphony. Last week Schuller's purpose seemed to be to catch the mood of Klee. All three may be very close in approach.

* * *

THE LATE Serge Koussevitzky commissioned Ravel to orchestrate the pieces Moussorgsky wrote originally for piano. It is a moot question how the credit for the work should be shared as between composer and orchestrator. It is a favorite of audiences and even more so of conductors.

There has been no one within my memory who captured an audience so completely and so immediately as yesterday's conductor. His appearance and his humility were undoubtedly factors, but his competence was a greater reason. He is but 28. His training was acquired partially by a year at the Berkshire Music Center four years ago where he was awarded the Koussevitzky Memorial scholarship and with many major orchestras scattered over a wide area. There is no indecision or immaturity in his command, nor are there any of the foibles a young conductor at times seems to feel are necessary to prove himself the consummate leader.

* * *

THERE WAS briskness in his Bizet, a symphony written when Bizet was 17, and which was unknown for 80 years. The long, sinuous line for oboe in the adagio was played with distinction by Ralph Gomberg whom Ozawa signaled to rise at the completion of the reading. Except for this slow movement, it might be a fair guess that it was music by Mendelssohn. The performance was crystal clear.

But the Hindemith was the conductor's major test and one passed with high marks. The final movement, "Temptation of Harmony," begins with broad, ad libitum cadenzas for strings first and then includes reeds. This is a formidable hurdle for anyone, no matter how experienced. Ozawa not only controlled his forces but did do expressively. He gave the concluding "Alleluia" a majestic breadth which earned him an ovation our mental records disclose has not been surpassed for eager submission to a personality. We hope this is but the first of a long series of opportunities to watch such a magnetic musician.

* * *

BETWEEN the transcendental suffering of "Tristan" and the ethereal fairyland of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is probably as great a distance as a musical cartographer can measure. The majesty of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was never more apparent than in the Saturday evening program which began and ended with these extremes of musical expression, and which contained as filling a contemporary study and a thrilling piano solo.

It was a pity that the other 100,000, more or less, residents of and visitors to the area could not have shared the great joy which the audience of 7,908 experienced Saturday night. This was music-making at its most exhilarating and satisfying.

* * *

THE OPENING "longing" phrase of the Prelude of Wagner's opera, "Tristan and Isolde," is a turn of simplest contour, on paper. In the fingers of the Boston cello section it represents the summit of a lifetime's study. One could actually "see" the tone grow and glow and then recede in an enveloping solution, the apogee of realization of Wagner's genius. Erich Leinsdorf inspired his men to an unforgettable eloquence and tension.

On the other end of the map the pressure of life and love was lifted and in weightless fanciful flights the Bostonians took off to the mythical territories Shakespeare sketched and Mendelssohn filled in with diaphanous cobwebs. The short-weight baker's dozen of sections of the incidental music to the drama were connected again, as last year, by a narration of lines from the play by Patricia Peardon. Miss Peardon's lucid diction and inspired inflections emitted by one whose personable appearance and elfish costume added immeasurably to the illusion of unreality were factors in a total performance in which each ingredient was unsurpassed.

* * *

THE TANGLEWOOD choir, prepared by Lorna Cooke deVaron, and soprano Helen Boatwright and mezzo-soprano June Genovese, all were fitting participants of the great performance. The whole program was recorded for television broadcast, and the stage was lighted more powerfully than usual.

The Study for Orchestra No. 2 by William Sydeman is a contemporary work, and is typical of the current attitude in harmonic acceptance. Sydeman was a student at the Berkshire Music Center only eight years ago and is now teacher at the Mannes College. The serial steps of his exposition are juggled and used over and over in contrasting instrumental areas and rhythmic variations. It develops powerful momentum in some situations and colorful tableaux in others. The composer was called to the stage to personally acknowledge the appreciation his music evoked.

IN AN EVENNG when sparks were flying most of the time, Lorin Hollander still was able to generate a brilliance which outshone the general lustre of the program. The "Burleske" of Strauss is near the "Midsummer" music in spirit. A striking but soft solo for kettledrums begins after which the orchestra falls in with a theme which recalls, anachronistically, a Kreisler Viennese reminiscence. The gentle warmth which pervades the piece — a single movement — even in its most displayful episodes is in the mood of an old movie, "Two Hearts in Three-Quarter Time." The youthful Hollander, making his second annual visit to Tanglewood, not only mastered the formidable intricacies with ease and uncanny zest, but, more important, draped the entire music with charm and grace and taste. There was not the percussive bombardment of his last year's Prokofieff, but there was maturity of keyboard command and artistic development. This is one of the rare opportunities in orchestral music where an audience may bestow recognition on a tympanist. Leinsdorf brought Everett Firth forth to receive his due award.

Newsclippings from the 1964 Tanglewood season showing the critics response to Mr. Ozawa's BSO debut, August 16, 1964.

TIGHT BINDING

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

AUG 17 1964

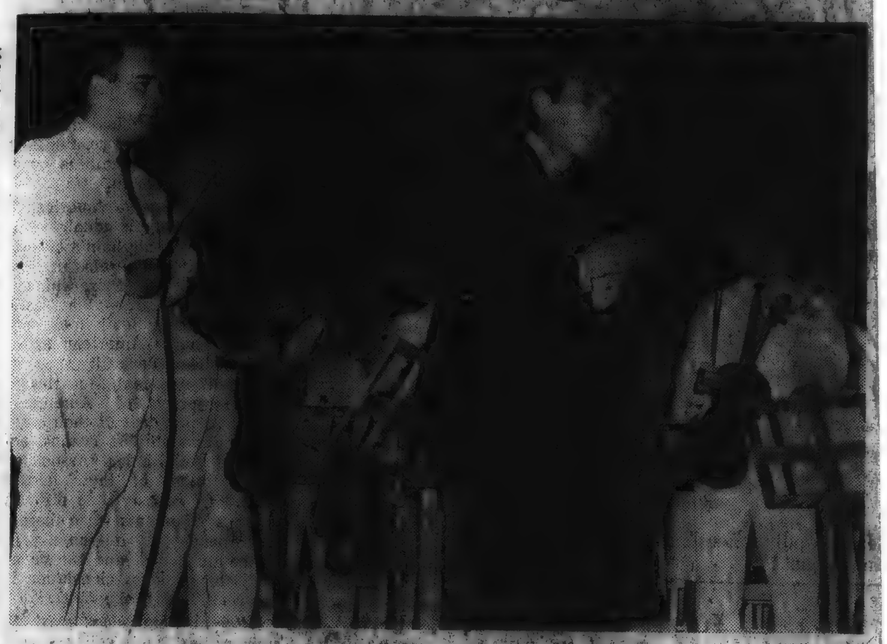
8th WEEK AUGUST 17th

109

Music Review

Weekend Concerts at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD



Conductor Seiji Ozawa receives plaudits of the audience

Whitestone

THE CONCERT at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon, the last of the seventh and penultimate weekend of the Berkshire Festival season, was conducted by a gifted young guest from Japan, Seiji Ozawa. He played the Bizet C Major Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" and the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Ozawa, small in stature and unequivocal in his artistic demands, gave an audience of 7,264 ecstatic pleasure. We have had a run of music inspired by pictures this season, starting with Klee a week ago and yesterday with Grunewald and Hartmann. Each composer has his own preferences of how he would convey graphic images in fleeting notes. Moussorgsky chose the most obvious way. He attempted to depict the subjects of Hartmann's picture by near-translation. Hindemith tried to catch the spirit of the symbolism of his own opera from which the three movements are extracted to make an orchestral symphony. Last week Schuller's purpose seemed to be to catch the mood of Klee. All three may be very close in approach.

* * *

THE LATE Serge Koussevitzky commissioned Ravel to orchestrate the pieces Moussorgsky wrote originally for piano. It is a moot question how the credit for the work should be shared as between composer and orchestrator. It is a favorite of audiences and even more so of conductors.

There has been no one within my memory who captured an audience so completely and so immediately as yesterday's conductor. His appearance and his humility were undoubtedly factors, but his competence was a greater reason. He is but 28. His training was acquired partially by a year at the Berkshire Music Center four years ago where he was awarded the Koussevitzky Memorial scholarship and with many major orchestras scattered over a wide area. There is no indecision or immaturity in his command, nor are there any of the foibles a young conductor at times seems to feel are necessary to prove himself the consummate leader.

* * *

THERE WAS briskness in his Bizet, a symphony written when Bizet was 17, and which was unknown for 80 years. The long, sinuous line for oboe in the adagio was played with distinction by Ralph Gomberg whom Ozawa signaled to rise at the completion of the reading. Except for this slow movement, it might be a fair guess that it was music by Mendelssohn. The performance was crystal clear.

But the Hindemith was the conductor's major test and one he passed with high marks. The final movement, "Temptation of St. Anthony," begins with broad, ad libitum cadenzas for strings first and then includes reeds. This is a formidable hurdle for anyone, no matter how experienced. Ozawa not only controlled his forces but did do expressively. He gave the concluding "Alleluia" a majestic breadth which earned him an ovation our mental records disclose has not been surpassed for eager submission to a personality. We hope this is but the first of a long series of opportunities to watch such a magnetic musician.

* * *

BETWEEN the transcendental suffering of "Tristan" and the ethereal fairyland of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is probably as great a distance as a musical cartographer can measure. The majesty of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was never more apparent than in the Saturday evening program which began and ended with these extremes of musical expression, and which contained as filling a contemporary study and a thrilling piano solo.

It was a pity that the other 100,000, more or less, residents of and visitors to the area could not have shared the great joy which the audience of 7,908 experienced Saturday night. This was music-making at its most exhilarating and satisfying.

* * *

THE OPENING "longing" phrase of the Prelude of Wagner's opera, "Tristan and Isolde," is a turn of simplest contour, on paper. In the fingers of the Boston cello section it represents the summit of a lifetime's study. One could actually "see" the tone grow and glow and then recede in an enveloping solution, the apogee of realization of Wagner's genius. Erich Leinsdorf inspired his men to an unforgettable eloquence and tension.

On the other end of the map the pressure of life and love was lifted and in weightless fanciful flights the Bostonians took off to the mythical territories Shakespeare sketched and Mendelssohn filled in with diaphanous cobwebs. The short-weight baker's dozen of sections of the incidental music to the drama were connected again, as last year, by a narration of lines from the play by Patricia Peardon. Miss Peardon's lucid diction and inspired inflections emitted by one whose personable appearance and elfish costume added immeasurably to the illusion of unreality were factors in a total performance in which each ingredient was unsurpassed.

* * *

THE TANGLEWOOD choir, prepared by Lorna Cooke deVaron, and soprano Helen Boatwright and mezzo-soprano June Genovese, all were fitting participants of the great performance. The whole program was recorded for television broadcast, and the stage was lighted more powerfully than usual.

The Study for Orchestra, No. 2 by William Sydeman is a contemporary work, and is typical of the current attitude in harmonic acceptance. Sydeman was a student at the Berkshire Music Center only eight years ago and is now teacher at the Mannes College. The serial steps of his exposition are juggled and used over and over in contrasting instrumental areas and rhythmic variations. It develops powerful momentum in some situations and colorful tableaux in others. The composer was called to the stage to personally acknowledge the appreciation his music evoked.

IN AN EVENNG when sparks were flying most of the time, Lorin Hollander still was able to generate a brilliance which outshone the general lustre of the program. The "Burleske" of Strauss is near the "Midsummer" music in spirit. A striking but soft solo for kettledrums begins after which the orchestra falls in with a theme which recalls, anachronistically, a Kreisler Viennese reminiscence. The gentle warmth which pervades the piece — a single movement — even in its most displayful episodes is in the mood of an old movie, "Two Hearts in Three-Quarter Time." The youthful Hollander, making his second annual visit to Tanglewood, not only mastered the formidable intricacies with ease and uncanny zest, but, more important, draped the entire music with charm and grace and taste. There was not the percussive bombardment of his last year's Prokofieff, but there was maturity of keyboard command and artistic development. This is one of the rare opportunities in orchestral music where an audience may bestow recognition on a tympanist. Leinsdorf brought Everett Firth forth to receive his due award.

Newsclippings from the 1964 Tanglewood season showing the critics response to Mr. Ozawa's BSO debut, August 16, 1964.

11D: 8TH WEEK AUGUST 17TH - 23RD.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PARK EAST
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

AUG 20 1964

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of works by Wagner and Verdi, on Saturday, August 22, at the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Mass.

New York Post
D. 317,237 SUN. 250,207

AUG 19 1964

Leopold Stokowski, director of the American Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday at 8 p.m. in the Music Shed, Tanglewood, Mass.

Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

AUG 16 1964

Leopold Stokowski is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony this week at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
AUG 15 1964

Tanglewood nears finale

By Whitestone

Erich Leinsdorf conducts tonight in the Berkshire Music Festival series at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.). Next week the season concludes with Leopold Stokowski on the podium on Friday evening and Mr. Leinsdorf conducting the Saturday and Sunday concerts. The final chamber music concert is Tuesday evening.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711
AUG 21 1964

The ARTS

Final Tanglewood Week-End Includes Verdi Requiem

Six events will conclude the final week-end of the Berkshire Festival and Music Center at Tanglewood. The Boston Symphony will give three concerts, tonight and Saturday at 8, and Sunday afternoon at 2:30. The orchestra's open rehearsal will start at 10 Saturday morning.

The two concerts by the Music Center will be an orchestral program, Richard Burgin conducting, Saturday at 3:30, and a Bach cantata program Sunday morning at 10.

Leopold Stokowski will conduct tonight. His program will open with Mozart's Sinfonia Cercertante in E flat, K. 297b, and continue with the Strauss tone poem, Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24. The program also includes Hovhaness' Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128; Rorem's "Eagles" (After Walt Whitman); and Stravinsky's Suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka."

Erich Leinsdorf will begin his Saturday evening concert with Excerpts from "Die Walkure," Act III, by Wagner, assisted by Ezio Flagello, bass. The program will conclude with the first performance at Tanglewood of Verdi's Requiem Mass (In memory of Elessandro Manzoni), with Lucine Amara, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; George Shirley, tenor; Ezio Flagello, bass; and the Chorus pro Musica of Boston, Alfred Nash Patterson, music director.

The Sunday afternoon concert, which will be not only the final Berkshire Festival program of the Summer but also the end of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 83rd season, will consist of two works by Beethoven and one by Richard Strauss, thus concluding the Berkshire Festival's observance of the 100th birthday anniversary of Strauss. The Sunday program will consist of Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72; Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92; and Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," (A Hero's Life), Op. 40. Leinsdorf will conduct.

For the evening concerts, the Tanglewood grounds and cafeteria will open at 6. Sunday afternoon the grounds and cafeteria will open at noon.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
American (e)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,200

Tanglewood Lists Final Week Events

LENOX, MASS. — The final week of the Tanglewood Music Festival will be a busy one that will include a gala evening Wednesday beginning at 4 o'clock and running through the evening with programs going on all over the place. The programs also include three weekend concerts presenting the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the guest conductorship of Leopold Stokowski on Friday evening and Erich Leinsdorf, musical director, both Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon.

For the final concert Sunday Leinsdorf is returning to music of Beethoven which for so many years graced the final program of the season at Tanglewood. He will conduct the orchestra in Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and the Beethoven "Symphony No. 7." Just to keep the record of Strauss music complete for the season there will be his "Ein Heldenleben" as the final selection of the season.

Stokowski will be guest conductor for part of the special Wednesday gala evening concert for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center. Thursday evening he will conduct music of Mozart, Strauss, Hovhaness, Rorem, and Stravinsky. Saturday night Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct music of Wagner and Verdi. He will present the "Requiem" with the Chorus Pro Musica and soloists.

The past week was an extremely busy one at Tanglewood for a series of contemporary American musicians was presented. Compositions commissioned by the Fromm Foundation for initial performance at Tanglewood were presented as were comparatively new works commissioned or first played within the past few years.

The concerts of the week end presented Max Rudolf as guest conductor with music of Smetana, Beethoven, Stravinsky, and Strauss on Friday evening and Seiji Ozawa as guest conductor with music of Hindemith, Moussorgsky, and Strauss at Sunday afternoon's concert. Mr. Leinsdorf conducted Saturday night with a program of Wagner, Strauss, Mendelssohn and the complete music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER & DEMOCRAT
D. 13,800
AUG 18 1964

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
AUG 22 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Sunday Register
Sun. Circ. 109,204
AUG 16 1964

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,402
AUG 22 1964

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 32,009
AUG 20 1964

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 32,009
AUG 20 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Sunday Republican
Sun. Circ. 114,397
AUG 16 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Record-American
M/E Circ. 441,810
AUG 22 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
BRISTOL, CONN.
Press
Eve. Circ. 14,611
AUG 15 1964

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 32,009
AUG 17 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
BRISTOL, CONN.
Press
Eve. Circ. 14,611
AUG 19 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Sunday Globe
Sun. Circ. 488,105
AUG 16 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193
AUG 15 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (e)
HAVERHILL, Mass.
Circ. 12,431
AUG 19 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
AUG 15 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Times
OAKVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 2,382
AUG 13 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 20 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132
AUG 20 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,191
AUG 20 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
AUG 13 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,787
AUG 20 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,499
AUG 19 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Citizen (e)
WINSTED, Conn.
Circ. 3,681
AUG 13 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bee
NEWTOWN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,506
AUG 21 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586
AUG 16 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 20 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
AUG 20 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
AUG 20 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News-Times (e)
DANBURY, Conn.
Circ. 23,828
AUG 20 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106
AUG 16 1964

MUSICAL NOTES

Tanglewood Season Enters Final Week

By EDGAR S. VANOLINDA

Leopold Stokowski

The Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood enter the final week of the 1964 season this week. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will present its final three concerts in the Music Shed on Friday and Saturday evenings at 8 p. m. and Sunday, Aug. 23, at 2:30 p. m., its final open rehearsal Saturday at 10 a. m. and its final Chamber Music Concert Tuesday at 8 p. m. The Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, will come to a close with a full week of events scheduled, including the String Symposium today and tomorrow and the great gala evening benefit Wednesday. row and the great gala evening benefit Wednesday.

Leopold Stokowski has accepted the invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time at Tanglewood on Friday at 8 p. m. His program will consist of Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante in E-flat, K. 297b; the tone poem "Death and Trnasfiguration," Op. 24 by Richard Strauss; the Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128 by Alan Hovhaness; Ned Rorem's "Eagles"; and Stravinsky's Suite from "Petrouchka." The Hovhaness and Rorem works will be heard for the first time at the Berkshire Festival concerts.

The final Saturday open rehearsal, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, will take place in the Music Shed at 10 a. m. Tickets will be available at the Tanglewood Box Office beginning 9 a. m.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the final two programs of this season's Berkshire Festival. On Saturday at 8 p.m., he will open the program with excerpts from "Die Walkure" by Wagner, including the Ride of the Valkyries, Wotan's Farewell and the Magic Fire Music, with Ezio Flagello, bass, as soloist. Mr. Leinsdorf will then conduct the first performance at Tanglewood of the Verdi Requiem, with Lucine Amara, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; George Shirley, tenor; Ezio Flagello, bass, and the Chorus pro Musica of Boston, Alfred Nash Patterson, Director.

Festival concert Sunday Aug. 23, at 2:30 p. m., Mr. Leinsdorf will present two works of Beethoven and close with a work by Strauss, thus completing his "Strauss Cycle" in recognition of the composer's 100th anniversary. His program will begin with Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72 and continue with the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, Op. 92. The concert will close with the tone poem "Ein Heldenleben", Op. 40, by Strauss.

The final Evening Chamber Music Concert will be held Tuesday at 8 p. m. in soprano, who was soloist at the theater. Phyllis Curtin, the Festival concert of August 8 and is on the faculty of the Music Center's Vocal Department this summer, will give a recital of songs by Mozart, Wolf, Berg, Strauss, and contemporary Latin American and American songs. Ryan Edwards will be her accompanist.

At the final Berkshire

112

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Albany Knickerbocker News
Wednesday, August 26, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Tuesday, September 1, 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
AUG 26 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
AUG 24 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 24 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
ATHOL, Mass.
Circ. 4,878
AUG 24 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
NEWPORT, R. I.
Circ. 12,454
AUG 24 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald News (e)
FALL RIVER, Mass.
Circ. 41,182
AUG 25 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
RUTLAND, Ve.
Circ. 20,275
AUG 25 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (e)
LEWISTON-AUBURN, Me.
Circ. 14,021
AUG 24 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Free Press (m)
BURLINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 34,204
AUG 24 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Caledonia-Record (e)
ST. JOHNSBURY, Vt.
Circ. 6,238
AUG 24 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 128,545
AUG 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Dalton-Hinsdale News
DALTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,200
AUG 27 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,191
AUG 25 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,787
SEP 3 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499
AUG 25 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
BROCKTON, MASS.
Enterprise & Times
Eve. Circ. 47,397
AUG 24 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499
AUG 24 1964

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,678
AUG 26 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Register
Eve. Circ. 98,547
AUG 25 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
Sun
Eve. Circ. 11,177
AUG 24 1964

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,422
AUG 29 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Journal
Morn. Circ. 63,635
AUG 24 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
Call
Eve. Circ. 27,550
AUG 24 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
Standard-Times
Eve. Circ. 66,819
AUG 24 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
Herald
Eve. Circ. 15,968
AUG 24 1964

CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS AND COURIER
D. 60,000 S. 74,000
AUG 30 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript-Telegram
Eve. Circ. 26,427
AUG 24 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WESTERLY, R. I.
Sun
Eve. Circ. 9,016
AUG 24 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
TAUNTON, MASS.
Gazette
Eve. Circ. 12,884
AUG 24 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711
AUG 25 1964

Musical Chairs

Berkshire Festival Attendance

Off 4%

By MARGO MILLER

LENOX—Attendance at the eight-week Berkshire Festival fell off 4 percent from the record set in 1963. The Tanglewood concerts concluded Sunday afternoon, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony.

This Summer, 224,320 persons spent $533,330.50 on 24 B.S.O. concerts; eight chamber music programs; eight open rehearsals, and the Boston Pops concert. The figures for 1963, for the same schedule, were attendance, 233,845, and receipts, $568,453.50. The Festival had raised ticket prices this year. Only the open rehearsals showed a gain in attendance.

Like the rest of New England, Berkshire County doesn't have climate, it has weather. A spokesman for the orchestra blamed the cold nights, in the last month of the festival often as low as 52 degrees, and the chilly days.

But indoor attractions in the county have also reported a drop in Summer tourism. Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival attendance was down 5 percent. The promised trade from visitors to the World's Fair, 150 miles south of Berkshire County, never materialized, much to the regret of innkeepers who had been told in the Spring to gird for untold numbers of Summer guests.

BOX OFFICE DRAWS

The Berkshire Festival continued the Richard Strauss cycle which the Boston Symphony had begun during the last part of its Winter season. The Tanglewood concerts included six tone poems, always popular with audiences, as well as seven works by Strauss for the stage, for voice, and for piano and orchestra. The composer was born one hundred year ago in June.

With the Strauss tone poems, the Festival programs numbered over two dozen so-called warhorses to tempt the most timid of music lovers. Except for Van Cliburn, however, soloists with the greatest pull at the box office were absent. These would include violinists Isaac Stern and Jascha Heifetz, and pianists Rudolf Serkin and Artur Rubinstein. Rubinstein's concert about 1952 holds the Tanglewood record: over 16,000.

By coincidence, the final Festival concert came 30 years to the day when the Berkshire Symphonic Festival began. This earlier organization hired players from the New York Philharmonic under Henry Hadley for three concerts in a horse-show ring about a mile from the present Tanglewood operation. The Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, was engaged two Summers later, in 1936.

No Public Farewell

Usually at the closing Festival concert, members retiring from the orchestra are brought forth by the conductor to make their farewell to the audience. Leinsdorf omitted this ceremony Sunday. Three players leaving the orchestra were not present. Principal cellist Samuel Mayes and his cellist wife, Winifred Winograd, had already left to join the late Summer season of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Boston's new principal, Jules Eskin from the Cleveland Orchestra, assumed Mayes' chair. Alfred Zighera came out of retirement to fill in for Mrs. Mayes. Jean de Vergie, a member of the oboe section since 1925, did not play the Tanglewood season. His replacement was Laurence Thorstenberg from the Chicago Symphony who will become the Boston's English horn player this Fall.

Joseph de Pasquale, Boston's principal violist, also joins the Philadelpia as first-desk player. Vladimir Resnikoff, one of the first violins since 1933, and Louis Speyer, English horn and oboe since 1918, played their final concerts with the orchestra. But Speyer will return next Summer as an administrator in the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's Summer school.

One of the highlights of the Tanglewood season was the extraordinary concert given last Wednesday as a benefit for the Music Center. Leinsdorf conducted the massed forces of the Boston Symphony and Music Center Orchestras in, among other things, the Fourth Tchaikovsky Symphony. The super pianissin that conductors dream of in the second movement, were achieved quite simply: only the B.S.O. played.

So what do you do for an encore, goes the gag. It was Sousa's "Stars and Stripes," with nine piccolos popping up for their obbligato. Not to be outdone, Leinsdorf who does not use a stick when he conducts, presided with a drum major's baton! He all but threw it in the air.

Leinsdorf's baton technique did not go unnoticed by the Music Center administration. About the last office memorandum issued each Summer is the "Ninth Week Schedule," a parody of the season's class lists. Leinsdorf is down for a class Thursday in baton twirling.

By that time he will be on vacation in New Mexico.

REVIEWS

113

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2073, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 20,304
AUG 22 1964

Music Review

Stokowski at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE SINGLE concert of the Tanglewood season which Leopold Stokowski had been invited to direct drew an audience of 4,333 last night in spite of the faint drizzle which persisted most of the evening. He was given an exceptional welcome even before he made a single gesture, and when the audience had a chance to show their appreciation of his evening's work they gave him a tremendous ovation.

He started with Mozart and then jumped forward a generous hundred years to Strauss, Stravinsky and two contemporary Americans, Hovhaness and Rorem, both former Berkshire Music Center students.

* * *

THE MOZART Sinfonia Concertante, E Flat, (K297b) is for wind-instrument soloists with a small orchestral accompaniment. Ralph Gomberg was oboe Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; and James Stagliano, horn. This is an extremely graceful work and the sonorities were deeply satisfying.

The outstanding feature of the evening was Stokowski's "Tod und Verklarung." Strauss at 25 was impelled to express in music the struggles and tortures of a man in the desperation of his last hours. The surging emotion of a "Tristan" was probably one of the influences which played upon him. When the stormy attack subsides, his childhood memories pass before him in a contrast of plaintive simplicity which Strauss knew so well how to develop.

* * *

ALAN HOVHANESS was in the hall when his Prelude and Quadruple Fugue was played and Stokowski called him to the stage. His music is straightforward and solid. One can see it being constructed before his eyes.

"Eagles" of Ned Rorem is a short piece after Walt Whitman's poem "The Dalliance of the Eagles." Where Hovhaness found strings apposite for his purpose, Rorem found wind instruments served him more graphically and the atmosphere he created and fights he delineated were full of imagination.

Stokowski started his "Petroushka" at the Russian Dance, in which Bernard Zighera was the stunning piano soloist. The astonishing rhythmic drive and barbaric impact keeps increasing until the poor dancer is driven to hysterics. It was a thrilling performance.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785
AUG 22 1964

Music: Stokowski Debut

Conducts First Concert at Tanglewood

By HOWARD KLEIN

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 21—The eighth and final weekend of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra began tonight with an improbable debut, as Leopold Stokowski conducted his first complete Tanglewood concert. The maestro was in good form.

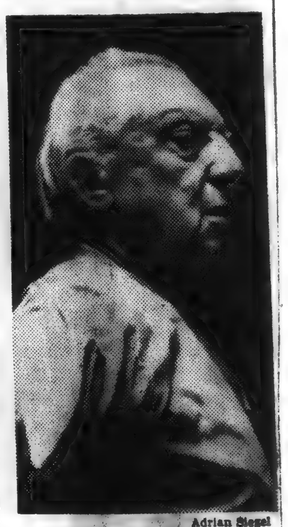
The program represented the kind of music he has been playing since he became conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony in 1909. It began with Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante in E flat (K. 297b) and ended with Stravinsky's suite from "Petruchka." Between, came Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," Ned Rorem's "Eagles" and Alan Hovhanness's Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra.

●

Mr. Stokowski led the Boston Symphony for his first time this season in Boston and led one number in the gala concert here Wednesday. One expects an octogenarian conductor to slow down a bit, and certainly there seems to be more economy of movement in Mr. Stokowski's conducting than in earlier days.

But there were moments when the fiery excitement boiled up, such as in the "Petruchka" and in the big climaxes of the Strauss. Here, the orchestra responded to his bursts of energy with vigorous and eloquent playing.

The Mozart, a delightful concerto for four winds, was played with a reduced orchestra, and the clarity of balance that emerged was admirable. The soloists, all drawn from the orchestra, were Ralph Gomberg, oboist (his borther Harold is the oboist for the New York Philharmonic); Gino Cioffi, clarinetist; Sherman Walt, bassoonist, and James Stagliano, French hornist.



Adrian Siegel

Leopold Stokowski

The Hovhaness Prelude and Quadruple Fugue was well received, and Mr. Hovhaness emerged on stage to share the applause with Mr. Stokowski. The work is successful but is not typical of Mr. Hovhaness, for its fugal nature lends it a Germanic sound, and the composer's best works are ore exotic with Oriental atmosphere.

Mr. Rorem's work was also received well, but, to this listener, it was an embarrassing potpourri of unfused elements. The work, written in 1958 by the 40-year-old United States composer, has strong hints of d'Indy, and some of its themes bear unfortunate likenesses to some in Strauss's "Salome" and in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
AUG 24 1964

Stokowski Is Granted Ovation at Tanglewood

Leopold Stokowski in his first appearance at Tanglewood won an amazing ovation on Friday evening for his interpretation of the Strauss' "Tod und Verklarung" and the Stravinsky' "Suite from Petrouchka."

* * *

THE EVENING'S program also included the Mozart' "Sinfonia Concertante in E flat, K. 297 b" for wind quartet and orchestra and works by Hovhaness and Rorem.

The opening concert of the final weekend of the summer season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it drew an audience of 4,333.

Now 82, Stokowski is erect and distinguished and his conducting retains the fire of a much younger man.

He conducts without a baton and with a minimum of movement, but the conducting is authoritative. In addition he appreciates the musicianship of the orchestra members and of the assisting soloists and is quick to acknowledge their contribution.

* * *

NOT SINCE the days of the late Serge Koussevitzky was there such full-throated approval of a conductor at Tanglewood.

The Strauss and the Stravinsky were the high spots of the program with their magnificent orchestral writing and imagery.

Bernard Zighera, first harpist and pianist of the orchestra, played the brilliant piano solo of the "Petrouchka" and the piano portion of Ned Rorem's "Eagles," written in 1958 and containing more noise than beauty.

The Alan Hovhaness' "Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra" is a truly intricate number with fascinating counterpoint and musical writing. The composer was present and was called to the platform to share the ovation which the number received.

* * *

SOLOISTS FOR the Mozart' "Sinfonia" were Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon and James Stagliano, horn. Particularly effective was the long quartet cadenza of the first movement and the slow movement with its lovely melody. The finale, "Andantino con variazioni" offers a pert theme with variations designed to show the soloists virtuosity.

Throughout the concert one was aware of the conciseness of the conducting and the rapidity of both attacks and cutoffs. Former conductor of both the Cincinnati and the Philadelphia orchestras, Stokowski has been conducting the American Symphony Orchestra, which he created, since 1862.

ERICH LEINSDORF, regular conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducted the final concerts of the season on Saturday night and yesterday afternoon. The Saturday program included Wagner's "Excerpts from 'Die Walkure, Act III,'" and a first performance of the Verdi' "Requiem Mass." Yesterday's program included the Beethoven "Overture to 'Fidelio' " and the "Symphony number 7" and the Strauss "Ein Heldenleben" with Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist in the latter. Soloists of Saturday evening were Lucine Amara, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; George Shirley, tenor; and Ezio Flagello, bass.

The close of the Tanglewood season always includes several farewells, both for orchestra members retiring and for members leaving to join other orchestras.

RETIRING this year are Louis Speyer, English horn soloist; Vladimir Resnikoff of the first violin section and Jean de Gargie, oboist.

Leaving the orchestra this year to join the Philadelphia Orchestra are Joseph de Pasquale, first viola; Samuel Mayes, first cello and Winifred Winegrad of the cello section, in private life Mrs. Mayes.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193
AUG 22 1964

Stokowski, 82, On Podium At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Leopold Stokowski, 82, began Friday night's program at Tanglewood with a warm and flowing performance of Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante, K297B, and continued it with an exalted performance of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

Commanding Presence

He was making his first appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a regular Berkshire Festival concert. He led the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras during the annual Gala Evening Wednesday.

Stokowski has lost none of his commanding presence. He stood with height and dignity on the podium, his flowing, white hair still his most arresting attribute.

His hands moved gracefully with the music, as always, and he wasted no energy on extra motion or flamboyance even when the music was crashing all around him.

But he was frail. He walked slowly to and from the wings. And his step had just a touch of the unsteadiness common to octogenarians.

Vast Solemnity

His command of the music, however, was complete. It is hard to imagine a performance of "Death and Transfiguration" with more spacious abundance and vast solemnity.

It flowed over the 4333 listeners in great waves of tone color and gradually built to its climax and "transfiguration" with the power of relentless accumulation.

The brilliant performance of Stravinsky's suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," which ended the program, was no more impressive with all its fireworks, and it aroused no greater response from the listeners, vigorous in both cases.

The Mozart which opened the program also received a performance of more than normal excellence and interest. It is a happy little piece in three movements that uses a quartet of woodwinds as a separate unit, a sort of semi-soloist. Stokowski used an orchestra of 35 members with the quartet, and he enticed a gentle, warm, smoothly flowing, silken tone from the group that obscured the sometimes monotonous rhythms in the first and third movements.

Comes Off Best

It was the middle movement that came off best, however. Its melodies were played by the quartet (singly, and in varying combinations) with the emotional sensitivity more commonly expected from early romantics like Mendelssohn.

Between the Strauss and the Stravinsky were the contemporary Prelude and Quadruple Rugue, Op. 128, by Hovhaness and "Eagles" by Rorem.

Both were short and efficiently played but were interesting mostly because of the appropriate transition they made between the full-bodied style of Strauss and the brilliant color of Stravinsky.

Tonight Erich Leinsdorf will lead the orchestra, Chorus Pro Musica and four Metropolitan Opera soloists in a performance of Verdi's "Requiem."

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2073, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
HARTFORD, CONN.
Times
Eve. Circ. 128,545
AUG 22 1964

Stokowski Is Friday Conductor

By GEORGE W. STOWE
Times Music Critic

LENOX, Mass. — Leopold Stokowski, who conducted for the first time at Tanglewood Friday night, transmuted some jaded repertory pieces into a memorable program by that unique musical alchemy for which he has bcome celebrated.

Despite his 82 years, this elder statesmen among conductors walks with an erect carriage and gestures with the grace and expressivity that has long been familiar to American audiences. If his step is a little more deliberate, his appearance is still young for his years. And that magnificent mane of white hair is still intact.

* * *

MOZART'S Sinfonia Concertante in E flat (K. 297b) was not only a showcase for the Boston Symphony's first desk woodwinds but a powerful reminder of Stokowski's willingness to allow his soloists to express their individuality in the ensemble. And his tempo for the Adagio was just that — a leisurely pace that helped to underline the ineffable beauty of Mozart's writing.

For this delightful work the soloists were Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; and James Stagliano, horn. Needless to say, they were ensemblists par excellance.

RICHARD STRAUSS has been more than well-served this year at Tanglewood but never with greater eloquence that he was Friday night with "Death and Transfiguration." The strings sang with the rare warmth that only Stokowski seems to elicit; the brass were in wonderful accord; and the climax came off with a blazing intensity that brought the audience to its feet. This was the Stokowski that one expected and he did not disappoint his admirers.

At any Stokowski program there is always contemporary music and Friday night the composers were Alan Hovhaness and Ned Rorem. I must say that Hovhaness, whose "Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra" was given after intermission, was the hero of the evening. His undeniable lyric gift and colorful orchestral palette made his work appealing for those who were not already familiar with it. Mr. Hovhaness, who was in the audience, appeared briefly onstage.

* * *

NED ROREM'S "Eagles" is inspired by Walt Whitman's "The Dalliance of the Eagles" but for this listener it lacked the cumulative force and the evocative orchestration that was to be found in the Hovhaness work. The Boston players brought their undeniable expertise to the music but it was a wasted effort.

For his grand finale Stokowski chose the familiar "Petrouchka" Suite of Stravinsky. Unlike Stravinsky's latter - day interpretation (which is meticulous and very dry), Stokowski treats it in the virile and primitive style that has become so popular for "Le Sacre."

The Boston Symphony did not perform "Petrouchka" with the high polish that Leinsdorf demands from the players (in fact, the performance was downright ragged in spots) but Stokowski managed to make it an exciting experience for the listener. One could almost feel the vigor and thrust of a staged performance under the legendary Diaghilev.

ARTICLE INCOMPLETE

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106

AUG 2 4 1964

T-U AT THE CONCERT

Tanglewood's Final Week Heightened by Stokowski

By EDGAR S. VANOLINDA

Tanglewood — Hail to the "Chief" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, for his magnanimous gesture in extending an invitation to Dr. Leopold Stokowski, to conduct Wednesday and Friday night's concerts in the final series of events of the 1964 Berkshire Music Festival.

Some conductors, like old soldiers do not die, neither do their mental, physical and musical powers "fade." The former conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, who established its tremendous prestige, is at the height of his distinguished career and presented one of the most exciting evenings of music in the years that Berkshire Music Festival has been bringing great music, great conductors and great cultural satisfaction to Tanglewood.

It is an interesting statistic that last week's guest conducor is only one year younger than the orchestra over which he presided and which was founded in 1881. As was his just due, Dr. Stokowski was accorded one of the greatest demonstrations of affection by the members of the orchestra and the capacity audience in the 27 years that the Bostonians have preempted their magnificent Tanglewood estate.

Watching Dr. Stokowski demonstrate his musical maturity, I was reminded of Oscar Levant's observation that if he could have his choice of all moments in musical history, it would have been "when Dr. Stokowski suddenly became conscious of his beautiful hands."

By the same token, the author of "A Smattering of Ignorance" might be intrigued with Mr. Leinsdorf's digital dexterity. Both conductors are able, like the fictional Svengali to inspire the "Trilbys" under their magical fingers to new brilliance and more complete musical attainment.

Dr. Stokowski offered a magnificent sampling of contemporary music: the aural transition of Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" in which the famous painting of Raphael Sanzio, in the Vatican in Rome took on additional dimensions through music.

Two modern works, Alan Hovhanass's "Prelude and Quadruple Fugue" for orchestra, with the composer called to the stage for enthusiastic recognition, Ned Rorem's flight into fantasy, "Eagles," and Stravinsky's musical carnival, the suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka" which brought the audience to its feet at its conclusion. The program was introduced by the "Sinfonia Concertante" by Mozart, with Ralph Gomberg, oboist; Gino Cioffi, clarinetist; Sherman Walt bassoonist and James Stagliano, French horn, scoring in a meticulous performance with the orchestra.

Saturday night's program included excerpts from Wagner's "Die Walkure" with Ezio Flagello, bass, lending vocal beauty to "Wotan's Farewell" aria. Verdi's "Requiem" was given a magnificent performance with a solo quartet, consisting of Lucine Amara, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; George Shirley, tenor and Ezio Flagello, bass, assisted by the Chorus Pro Musica and the Festival Chorus. The Mass, dedicated to the memory of Alessandro-Manzoni, had special appeal for Albany members of the audience from the fact that the late Rt. Rev. Edmund F. Gibbons former Bishop of the Albany Diocese was an intimate friend of Mr. Manzoni, when both were students in Rome. The tenor, George Shirley, of the Metropolitan Opera Company will be remembered for his equally fine performance of the "Requiem" with the Capitol Hill Choral Society in Albany, two years ago.

The final event of the eight weekend series of Tanglewood concerts included the Overture to "Fidelio" and the Seventh, or "Apotheosis of the Dance" symphony by Beethoven, an ideal introduction to the tone poem: "A Hero's Life," the alleged musical biography of its composer, Richard Strauss, which was the climax of Mr. Leinsdorf's projected plan to "explore" one particular composer each season. "A Hero's Life" was the 13th exposition of the German composer's tremendous series of vignettes during 1964.

Mr. Leinsdorf has kept the faith and presented a season of tremendous variety, programming many of the standards and a modicum of modern works whose life expectancy is often conjectural. Many of the works were heard for the first time at Tanglewood, and others, for the first time in America.

Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

AUG 2 2 1964

Winding Up Tanglewood— The Hands of Stowkowski

By John Gruen

LENOX, Mass.

There was a goodly nip in the air and a smattering of raindrops last evening as the Boston Symphony Orchestra launched into its eighth and final weekend of concerts at Tanglewood.

Conducting the orchestra for the fourth time at the Festival was Leopold Stokowski. The spry and unceasingly dramatic looking octogenarian drew an ovation as he stepped to the podium, and his presence before the Boston players—as he lifted his hands to lead them—seemed to elicit sound of very special force and affection—the sort that transcended mere sheen and professionalism.

The evening was devoted to music of Mozart, Richard Strauss, Alan Hovhaness, Ned Rorem, and Stravinsky. As is his wont, Mr. Stokowski illuminated each work with the uninhibited, yet securely wrought tones and colors of a master certain of his gifts and ideas.

Mozart's "Sinfonia Concertante in E Flat" is not often performed. It is written for oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon with string orchestra, and, like his more frequently heard Koncertante Sinfoniex for violin and viola, abound in the purest, most effervescent lyricism. The abridged orchestra with four wind players drawn from the orchestra serving as soloists sifted its melodies and harmonic fabric with skill and elegance.

The symphonic poems of Richard Strauss are veritable hymns to expressiveness and apocalyptic strivings. Mr. Stokowski performed his "Death and Transfiguration," written when the composer was in his middle twenties. All the earmarks of Strauss' later orchestral virtuosity is present here, with gargantuan shafts of sound giving way to gorgeous and ecstatic passages of poetry. It is, of course, the kind of music Mr. Stokowski can transform into magical experience, and the orchestra seemed, itself, transported by the maestro's unerring drive.

A work by Alan Hovhaness, "Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra," seemed a let-down after the Strauss. The oriental cast that pervades all of Hovhaness' music was again very much in evidence, but couched in the highly Western methods by which it was conceived, the work seemed neither fish nor fowl, and lingered between auras of exoticism and paler milieus.

Ned Rorem's "Eagles" based on a Walt Whitman poem was an energetic and thoroughly inventive work that boasted strong and beautiful instrumental combinations. The soaring quality of the eagle's wings in motion, as well as that bird's fierceness was translated into sound that matched the poetry's intent. Mr. Stokowski gave it a brilliantly incisive reading.

The concert concluded with Stravinsky's Suite from the ballet Petrouchka. Again, the colors flew in every direction and the simultaneously brittle, sinuous, and often diabolical score came to glowing life.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

WORCESTER, MASS.
Telegram
Morn. Circ. 58,744

AUG 24 1964

Music:

Berkshire Festival Comes to Close

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The 27th Berkshire Music Festival ended yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood with an ovation for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor Erich Leinsdorf.

The audience of 8,703 made a weekend total of 33,967. The eight - week total for all events was 224,320 with box office receipts of $533,330. This is 9,525 less attendance than the 1963 festival, with a loss of $35,123.

Silverstein Soloist

Yesterday's program was Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture, Opus 72, and Symphony No. 7 in A Major, Opus 92, and Richard Strauss' tone poem "Ein Heldenleben" Opus 40, with Joesph Silverstein as solo violinist.

For some, the program's pinnacle was Strauss' bold, noble and tender "Heldenleben" or "A Hero's Life." But it remained for Beethoven's Seventh Symphony to say the greater things in the voice of the giant.

This was indicated in the symphony's introduction. Leinsdorf interpreted a carefully phrased, deliberate reflection. The woodwinds sang their solos expressively. Once the main body of the movement was launched in winds, the course was swift and a straight line was drawn to climax. A beautiful exposition of the main theme in flute was given by Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

The stately, somber second movement (genre of funeral march) could have started an argument with regard to Leinsdorf's tempo. As it developed, it wasn't slow enough to sound labored or despondent, nor so hastened as to lose identity. This was morbid, tearful procession, but a solemn rite dance.

Scherzo Brilliant

Scherzo rushed through brilliant episodes, pausing only for a lyrical, hymn trio in which winds have the spotlight. The finale was played with enormous energy and incisiveness through its turbulent measures. The horns compensated here for blemishes they had encountered earlier.

The "Fidelio" overture proved to be a jubilant concert opener — more than is customary. It was a fine exposition of contrasts between heavily implemented chords and gentle responses. Rhythm was loose enough to make the music flow. Horns weren't always clear-toned, but this was a passing detail. The overture traveled with steadfast momentum and plan.

In' "Hero's Life," Strauss, seeking to prove his critics' incompetence, snarls at his snarling critics, has a love duet with

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785
AUG 24 1964

Music: Season Ends at Tanglewood

Leinsdorf Directs Final Program at Lenox

By HOWARD KLEIN

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 23 — The 29th season of concerts at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to a close this afternoon as Erich Leinsdorf conducted a Beethoven-Strauss program. This is the 100th anniversary of Richard Strauss, and he was honored by the performance of 13 of his works. The one that closed the festival was his monumental "Ein Heldenleben."

Attendance has been lower this season than last, with 22,720 paid admissions as compared with 233,845. Several reason for the drop have been advanced, a recurrent one being the weather. The last four weeks here have been unseasonably cold, with record low temperatures on six days.

Another reason offered has been the lack of enterprise in the programs: This summer's repertory was drawn from the orchestra's winter season. But this seems unlikely, since many unfamiliar works were included as well as the crowd-pleasing standards.

Eight contemporary composers were represented, five of them from the United States.

Last night's Wagner-Verdi concert was also led by Mr. Leinsdorf, and it was well attended—8,438 came in a drizzle that turned into a soaking rain—and well received They cheered and applauded for 8 minutes and 20 seconds after the Verdi Requiem, which formed the second half.

The soloists were Lucine Amara, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; George Shirley, tenor, and Ezio Flagello, bass. The Chorus Pro Musica contributed 111 singers and the Festival Chorus supplied 80.

The most striking aspect of the performance, which was for this listener not a distinquished one, was the new bass drum, which sounded like bomb bursts in the "Dies Ira." The two percussionists looked as if they were bashing an enemy to a pulp in these passages as their arms hammered the drums.

The new drum, which arrived from London last Tuesday, is 4 feet across and has a single oxhide head. This enables it to make more vibrations than a conventional two-headed bass drum, one of which was used by the second percussionist.

Besides the startling effects on loud passages, the new drum produced sounds when lightly tapped, as in the "Lachrymosa," to one listener that felt like blows in the pit of the stomach.

These sound effects, plus some spectacular lightning that illuminated the interior of The Shed from time to time, and the accompanying roars of thunder, contributed some appropriate stage effects to the operatically conceived Requiem.

The handling of it by Mr. Leinsdorf and his forces was certainly adequate, for one got the message of the work, but it was not a memorable performance.

Without a great degree of finesse, the work can sound merely bombastic, and many details were blurred or not clearly set out.

Mr. Flagello was the most satisying singer, for his solid, vibrant tone had freedom and security. Miss Chookasian did her portions well, too, but Miss Amara and Mr. Shirley were not in their best form, for both suffered from pitch and vocal insecurity.

Mr. Flagello made an equally fine impression in "Wotan's Farewell," the central of three preceding excerpts from "Die Walküre."

Mr. Leindsdorf led from memory, a prodigious, if typical feat for this conductor, and his work was often exciting. But to one, the Verdi lacked the kind of dramatic growth to sustain interest from its quiet opening, through the furious middle sections, to the quiet resignation of the close.

Mr. Leinsdorf's "Heldenleben" is a familiar story through his recording with the Boston Symphony, and he brings to it a satisfying, broad conception.

The orchestra plays this work well. Especially good were the violin solos that Joseph Silverstein, the concert-master played so tenderly, and with such elegant brilliance. His sweet tone provided the right focal point for the epic work, for it gave it a personal, almost sentimental quality to balance the noisy, grander moments.

Mr. Leinsdorf is good in this repertory, and this performance was no exception. The response to the long work was rather mild, but for this listener it was a notable occasion.

Erich Leinsdorf

Beethoven and Strauss Close 29th Year

Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and Symphony No. 7 formed the first half, and they received vigorous readings. The second movement of the symphony may have set a speed record, which did not impart to it the mystery and the grandness that slower speeds do.

It was taken at about 80 quarter notes a minute, which benefited the flowing trios but not the opening.

Also, the quarter notes of the opening theme were played staccato, an original and not ideal concept to this listener. But the rest was exciting in a headlong way, and the 8,703 in the audience showed that they liked it.

This last concert also ended the 46-year tenure with the orchestra of Louis Speyer, the oboe and English-horn player. Mr. Speyer, who is 74 years old, came here in 1918. He had played in the first performance of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," under Pierre Monteux in 1913.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193
AUG 24 1964

Tanglewood Season Ends Before 8703

PAGE ONE

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended this years Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood with a panoramic performance of Richard Strauss' autobiographical tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," Sunday afternoon.

"Classic Perfection"

But that epic event came about after they had spread before 8703 listeners a Beethoven Seventh Symphony of classic perfection.

It was a bountiful afternoon. Not only was there a demonstration of the superior kind of craftsmanship Boston's orchestra can create from a virtuosic score like "Ein Heldenleben," but also there was an example of what a virtuosic orchestra can do with a standard score.

The Strauss tone poem is a long piece containing the gamut of symphonic color. The scope of the orchestration is wide and deep, as is most of the Straussian musical poetry.

Talent required

It usually requires an orchestra of Boston's talents to keep the multitude of ingredients separate and flowing independently and clearly for all to hear.

So often this music becomes muddy because of the frequent coming and going and overlapping of the orchestral departments. Sunday it was clean, sparkling and luxurious. . .an appropriate symbol of abundance with which to end the festival.

Both Beethoven works (the "Fidelio" overture was first) heard before intermission were played by Boston's orchestra in Springfield's Municipal Auditorium last April and as exciting as they were then, the success Leinsdorf had with them Sunday could hardly be surpassed.

"Incisive, Polished"

The Seventh Symphony especially sounded as if it were engraved in velvety bronze. It was incisive and polished, silky and sonorous and seemingly as solid and permanent as a marble carving.

The tempos were elegantly tasteful, never reaching unseemly speed nor losing their healthy momentum, and the volumes never seemed to be loud but always finely balanced between solidity and strength.

The quiet sections were especially successful in implying the underlying potential power (like a gentle tiger) so characteristic of Beethoven's music.

Six members of the orchestra ended their tenure Sunday with the close of the 1963-64 season.

Samuel Mayes, principal cellist, of the Philadelphia Orchestra. He joined the Boston Orchestra, in 1943.

His replacement, Jules Eskin, played with the orchestra at the gala last Wednesday and during the three final weekend concerts. He was principal cellist with the Cleveland Orchestra.

Winifred Winograd, cellist, will accompany her husband, Mayes, to the Philadelphia Orchestra. She joined the Boston Orchestra in 1957.

Depasquale Leaving

Joseph Depasquale, principal violist, will become principal violist with the Philadelphia Orchestra this fall. He joined the Boston Orchestra in 1947.

He joined the Boston Orchestra in 1947.

His replacement, Burton Fine, is a member of the orchestra's second violin section.

Eskin and Fine won their first chair appointments on the recommendation of an orchestra-members' committee.

Three retiring members of the orchestra are Louis Speyer, English horn, after 46 years; Jean Devergie, oboe, after 39 years, and Vladimir Resnikoff, violin, after 32 years.

Total Berkshire Festival 1964 attendance was 224,320, second highest attendance in the history of the festival. The highest was last year — 233,845.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WATERBURY, CONN.
American
Eve. Circ. 41,200
AUG 24 1964

8,703 Enjoy Tanglewood's Final Concert

(Special to The American)

LENOX, MASS. — The last concert of the eight-week Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood which presented music of Beethoven and Strauss Sunday afternoon under the conductorship of Eric Leinsdorf ended on a note of enthusiasm and applause warm enough to keep musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and their director happy until the opening of next year's season on July 2.

The Sunday afternoon audience, numbering 8,703, despite early threats of rain and fog in some areas, heard an unusually fine performance of the Beethoven "Symphony No. 7" and the concluding Strauss "Ein Heldenleben," a tone poem, with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaser, as soloist on the violin. The tone poem was one of the six by Richard Strauss included in the course of the concerts in celebration of the centenary of the composer's birth. Seven works from Strauss's music for stage, for voice, and for piano and orchestra were performed during the eight-week season. The concert began with the overture to "Fidelio."

The week-end programs had brought Leopold Stokowski as guest conductor on Friday night in music of Mozart, Strauss, Stravinsky and others. The Saturday night program for 8,438 presented the Verdi "Requiem Mass," for four solo voices with chorus and orchestra, Mr. Leinsdorf, who conducted, began with the Wagner excerpts from Act III of "Die Walkure." Total attendance for the week was 33,967, including 8,193 at the Gala for the benefit of the Music School on Wednesday afternoon and evening.

Figures for the season show that the summer of 1964 had four unseasonably cold week ends, that the first three weeks of August averaged 8 degrees below normal per day, and that six days reached new minimum lows, a 25-year record. Despite these adverse conditions, attendance for the 1964 festival dropped only 4 per cent below the record 1963 attendance of 233,845. The grand totals for 1964 were 224,320, with total receipts dropping to $533,330.50 from the high of $568,453.50. Figures for the Berkshire Festival concerts totaled 169,998 as compared with 186,771. Attendance at the eight open rehearsals on Saturday mornings to benefit the orchestra pension fund increased to 46,129 as compared with 32,305 last year.

Unfavorable Weather

The six chamber orchestra concerts during the middle of each week showed a drop of almost 20,000 to 33,587 which may be accounted for in large part by unfavorable weather. The concerts with the full Boston Symphony orchestra were attended by 128,866 this year as compared with 127,225 last year when three less were given. The eight chamber music concerts were attended by 7,545 as contrasted with the 6,062 who heard the six concerts in 1963. In considering the Tanglewood season one must also bear in mind that the World's Fair must have had some influence on attendance figures especially when weekend weather forecasts so often were not encouraging for those making long trips to the beautiful Berkshires.

The season was Eric Leinsdorf's second as director since taking over from Charles Munch. In the past two seasons he has shown a deep concern for the Berkshire Music Center and has devoted a good deal of his attention to strengthening its program for teaching young musicians from all parts of the country and from abroad. During this summer season audiences at Tanglewood heard two American premiers and 31 other works which had not been performed previously at the Festival concerts. It was as though Mr. Leinsdorf was subtly transforming the Festival into a music school not only for the students but for the general music loving public as well.

For six of the distinguished musicians it was their last appearance as members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Joseph de Pasquale, first viola, Samuel Mayes, first cello, and Mrs. Mayes, of the cello section, are leaving the orchestra and will join the Philadelphia Orchestra. Three of the musicians are retiring. Louis Speyer, English horn soloist; Vladimir Resnikoff, of the first violin section; and Jean de Vergie, oboist.

The Sunday afternoon concert marked the 30th anniversary of the first concert presented at the Hanna Farm in 1934 from which the festival developed, and the 29th year since the Boston Symphony Orchestra first participated. When the Boston first performed at the festival in 1936, it gave three concerts in four days before audiences totaling 15,000. One might well say in looking back 30 years to the first concert at the Hanna Farm: "How mighty an oak has grown from that first small acorn." For the mighty oak includes also the Berkshire Music Center which just completed its 24th season for the training of young musicians.

S. M.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,678
AUG 25 1964

A German Program Delightful at Tanglewood

By DANIEL L. CUSICK

...inal concert of the Berk... Festival series in Tangle... was one of the finest of ...ummer.

...Leinsdorf conducted the ... Symphony Orchestra in ...German program which ... the ideal capping-off for ...ival.

"Opening with the "Fidelio Overture" of Beethoven, Leinsdorf used the first strong statements in the overture to set the pace for the whole afternoon. With unfaltering good taste and control he led the ensemble through the work at an ideally realized and vigorous pace.

The Seventh Symphony of the same composer received the same treatment. Often, the second movement of the symphony is taken at a rate slower than the prescribed "Allegretto" and a deadly boredom sets in.

But the Sunday afternoon concert had a brightness throughout the complete playing. The final movement of the "Seventh" was built to a tremendous climax by the steady unleashing of fuller sonorities and gradually increased tempos. It was a thrilling rendition of the work.

Because this is the 100th anniversary of the birth of Richard Strauss, the orchestra has performed many of the composer's works in the course of the summer season.

The last work to be heard at the Tanglewood shed was "Ein Heldenleben."

The amazing Boston brass and woodwind sections and the violin solos of concertmaster Joseph Silverstein were at the beck and call of Leinsdorf as he drew forth an amazingly lucid and stimulating performance of the tone poem.

Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

AUG 2 4 1964

Appropriately, Nature Joins Festival's Last Act

By John Gruen

LENOX, Mass.

The Berkshire Hills echoed with loud thunderclaps and heavy rain Saturday evening as Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a double chorus, and four soloists performed Verdi's monumental "Requiem Mass."

Indeed, it seemed fitting for nature to enlist some of her own drama, not only to underscore the majesty of Verdi's music, but also to give an over-all eloquence to the concluding weekend of the Berkshire Festival, which for the past eight weeks and 27 seasons has made Tanglewood and its acoustically perfect music shed one of the country's best loved musical shrines.

Mr. Leinsdorf brought about a stunning array of sound nuance and inflection as he led the Boston Symphony, the Chorus Pro Musica, the Festival chorus and soloists Lucine Amara, Lili Chookasian, George Shirley and Ezio Flagello in the Verdi Mass. It is, of course, a work that powerfully fuses theatricality with religious fervor, binding Verdi's predominant secular sensibilities to a religious framework of gigantic proportions.

The conductor seemed to reach into the very roots of the music, drawing forth a performance of cohesion and emotional depth—one that never swerved into bombasticism or sentimentality for its own sake.

The soloists and chorus were inspired interpreters under Mr. Leinsdorf's inspired direction.

Only occasionally did a faulty pitch or a strained note on the part of Mr. Shirley and Miss Amara mar momentarily an otherwise beautifully integrated performance.

The Verdi was preceded by three rousing excerpts from Act III of Wagner's "Die Walkure," with Mr. Flagello singing the Wotan passages to very great advantage.

Yesterday afternoon's concert—the Festival's last—consisted of Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," his Symphony No. 7, and, as a concluding homage to Richard Strauss' centenary, that composer's tone poem "Ein Heldenleben," with violinist Joseph Silverstein as the excellent soloist.

Mr. Leinsdorf again conducted the Boston players with a buoyant, clear and intellectually stimulating grasp of what every note was about. The orchestra responded with all its predictable lushness of tone particularly outshining itself in the Strauss, which for all its egocentric and pretentious allusions, is still as thrilling an evocation as any of one man's unshakable belief in himself.

For the record, the total attendance for the season was 224,320. Ticket sales amounted to $533,330.50, a figure that is 4 per cent lower than last year's intake.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

WORCESTER, MASS.
Sunday Telegram
Sun. Circ. 102,435

AUG 23 1964

Music: Wagner, Verdi Works at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Last night's concert at Tanglewood; next-to-last of the Berkshire Music Festival, will live long in the memories of the 8,438 persons who attended.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in excerpts from Wagner's opera, "Die Walkure." These were a frequently linked combination from act III "Ride of the Valkyries," "Wotan's Farewell," and "Magic Fire Music." Ezzio Flagello was soloist.

The festival's final choral work with orchestra was Verdi's "Manzoni" requiem. Chorus Pro Musica of Boston was prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson. The assisting Festival Chorus was prepared by Thomas A. Sokol. There was a total of 191 mixed voices.

Verdi Soloists

Soloists for the Verdi were all members of the Metropolitan Opera - Lucine Amara, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto, George Shirley, tenor; and Flagello, bass.

Wagner's music has been "specialty of the house" at Tanglewood this summer, quite as Tchaikovsky's had been during the Serge Koussevitzky regime.

There are few more dramatic starts for a concert than "Ride of the Valkyries." In the opera, it takes two full acts before the storm clouds sweep over the mountain tops while the Valkyre maidens spur their steeds through the raging tempest.

Brilliant Sound

Last night it was like being thrust suddenly into a whirlpool of brilliant sound. It was a wild, eerie scene, stirring portrayed by the orchestra, with brasses exercising greatest power. Next in the narrative, Brunhilde faces the wrath of her godlike father Wotan. Her misdeeds must be punished with degradation and banishment from Valhalla.

But then he becomes the girl's father, wretched in the grip of iron law. And the scene becomes one of poignant sorrow.

Flagello had reflected much of this emotion some time before he got to sing a note. He appeared somewhat ill at ease and occasionally ran his hand across his face. Although he had a score before him on a music stand, he relied very little on it, once he received Leinsdorf's cue.

Powerful Delivery

He gave a powerful delivery of Wotan's long farewell - filled with noble pathos and intimacy of the father's feelings. He sang with vocal opulence, sensitivity and dramatic verve, using just enough gesture to make thoughts more meaningful. Insofar as concert performance tastefully permits, he brought the character to life. His tone was rich and vibrant.

Woodwinds brought vivid evocation to the "Magic Fire Music." Leinsdorf used a skillful hand merging the opposites of crackling flames and Brunhilde enchanted spell. It was a stirring moment when the brasses proclaimed the exultant prophecy that Brunhilde would be awakened by the hero Siegfried.

The real climax, however, was the orchestra's muted sound at the end as Wotan takes a final look at his condemned daughter and leaves. It was an epic performance that created narrative and characters. The only lack was a frame for the picture.

Verdi Work

Verdi's Requiem (composed in memory of the Italian poet Alessandro Manzoni) was done with sensitive balance and power. This was the finest choral performance of the summer. In fact, it was well-nigh perfect in every sense - not the least amazement being that Leinsdorf conducted it from memory.

The impression was not an emotional elegy of death, but a tonal drama of Judgement Day with fervent appeal for mercy. Everything about the performance seemed inspired and designed.

The chorus sang with marvelous vitality and total participation. A shadowy quality permeated the opening Requiem where the orchestra sometimes blankets voices — but did not last night.

Beam of Tonal Light

As the tenor and bass joined in the Kyrie, a beam of tonal light appeared in the somber texture, fully brightened by chorus and solo quartet. Quality of ensemble was pure even in passages of utmost gentility. A heavy downpour did an obbligato on the roof of the Music Shed but even that didn't obscure the clarity of words.

Great unison shots in the Dies Irae had tremendous impetus, also the whistling descending notes that create a state of terror.

Shirley has a clear, powerful voice of resonance which he projects with ease. Miss Amara scaled the height of ensemble range with a ringing tone and ample strength. Miss Chookasian had uncommon depth and fullness in this substantial ensemble. And Flagello not only repeated the glowing vocal qualities of the Wagner but adapted himself admirably to the totally different Verdi role.

Enormous Power

There was enormous power in the Dies Irae. Words were hurled over full orchestral sound and bass drums struck full power. The marvel was the control with which the chorus digressed into whispered dialogue. There was exciting dialogue between trumpets onstage and those stationed at a distance.

This afternoon the eight-week festival ends. Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony in Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, Opus 72, and Symphony No. 7 in A Major, Opus 92. Joseph Silverstein will be violin soloist in Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," Opus 40.

NEW YORK
Amsterdam News
W. 61,795

SEP 1 2 1964

Music Review IN by Perdita Duncan

Berkshire Festival Ends

The 8th and final week of the Berkshire Festival, held at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, was brought to a close with the playing of some of the most moving music ever heard.

For those who have never attended this Festival, it should be noted that the beauty of the surroundings seems to give a greater depth to the music. Vast expanses of lush green grass, tall stately trees, the soft quiet of the countryside set the mood for contemplative listening. Thus, the program given on Saturday evening had a setting that encompassed all the profound qualities of the great composers accompanied by Nature's sights and sounds.

The program opened with excerpts from Wagner's "Die Walkure" Act III. Baritone, Ezio Flagello sang 'Wotan's Farewell' with all the heartbreak that this great aria required. The passionately held convictions with which the listeners felt the "Ride of the Valkyries" and the "Magic Fire Music" should have been interpreted, were readily captured by Erich Leinsdorf conducting The Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Maestro used no score for this work, nor for the magnificent Verdi "Requiem" which followed.

With over 190 voices of The Chorus Pro Musica and The Festival Chorus, the great swells and surges of the choral passages were beautifully controlled. The soloists, Lucine Amara, soprano; Lili Chookasion, contralto; George Shirley, tenor and Ezio Flagello, gave the work great drive and emotion. Mr. Shirley's tenor solo, "Ingemisco" was sung with tender majesty.

Nature Augments 'Requiem'

It was during the performance of the "Requiem" that Nature's display of might accompanied the Mass with thunder along with rolls of sound on the tympani. As the lightening flashed, the great surges of voices gave the "Dies Irae" portion a grandeur and power that was filled with awe.

On Sunday afternoon, the final program was given. Again Erich Leinsdorf conducted The Boston Symphony Orchestra. Beethoven was given the major part of the program with his Overture to "Fidelio" and "Symphony No. 7 in A major" having been played prior to intermission. While there was no doubt about Mr. Leinsdorf's convictions in the "Fidelio" Overture, he proved to be a phenomenon in the drive, with which he conducted the "Symphony". One never ceased to admire the Maestro's ability and musicianship, for he used no score.

There was such a fastidiousness given the music that the thrill and beauty of Beethoven's creative vitality surged and throbbed through the Music Shed and out into the surrounding area. The stepped up tempi gave an even greater exuberance to the mood of the music.

The program closed with Strauss's Tone Poem "Ein Heldenleben", with Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. Whatever reservations musicologists many have about this work, their feelings were not those of the audience. For when the final note sounded, one of the noisiest demonstrations, that we have ever heard, erupted. After participating the applause for longer than five minutes, we finally had to leave to catch our bus. The audience was still applauding as we stepped aboard.

Post
WALLINGFORD, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,623

AUG 27 1964

Last Tanglewood Reviews

Friday Evening
By ...

...ve he ...r-
...tokow-
...formal
...al con-
... to as-
...is, of
...he is an
...ise ex-
...belo ed
... el it
...t a ...e-
...ducto s
...the most
...ody En...

Stokow-
...irely ap-
...e he had Sinfonia
... was writ-
...ser was 22;
...sfiguration,
...; Petrouch-
...y was 29.

...on the other
...mparatively ac-
... which he composed
... Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, and Ned Rorem, whose Eagles was performed, a respectable 35. It is no adverse criticism of these ... Americans to note that their scores do not measure up in stature or inspiration to those of the older masters. Both are small-scale works.

The Hovhaness, however, is a thoroughly professional job, and I should enjoy hearing it again. The Mozart was beautifully performed, and the small orchestra maintaining a perfect balance with the skillful soloists. Both the Strauss and the Stravinsky sounded brand-new.

Saturday Evening
By G.F.C.

It was an interesting idea to pit the two giants of 19th Century music drama, Wagner and Verdi, against each other. In advance it looked strange, yet somehow it worked well. The lyrical Wagner excerpt nicely offset the frequently furious intensity of the Verdi, and any of the now dated criticism of the Requiem on grounds of its theatricality was averted by placing it in a context that was frankly theatrical.

Mr. Leinsdorf's performance of Wotan's Farewell stressed the long line without imposing superfluous accents or effects. Ezio Flagello, as Wotan, rode out the flood of orchestral sound with great beauty of tone but rather less involvement in Wotan's personal drama than might be desirable in the opera house.

The performance of the Verdi Requiem was stupendous. The soloists, for the most part, were excellent. Mr. Flagello's large voice was best suited to the size of the performing forces, and he sang with greater involvement than in the Wagner. George Shirley is a lyric, rather than heroic, tenor. There was a trace of strain in the more forceful passages, but great beauty and sensitivity in the quieter ones.

Lili Chookasian's dark, rich contralto was perfectly used for both solo and ensemble passages. Lucine Amara, on the other hand, was too bright a soprano for a cohesive blending of the solo quartet. The large chorus sang with distinction, and Mr. Leinsdorf merits every accolade for an inspired performance.

Sunday Afternoon
By J.W.H.

The 1964 season at Tanglewood came to a splendid close on Sunday afternoon with the Boston Symphony's music director, Erich Leinsdorf, conducting Beethoven's Overture to Fidelio, Opus 72; the Symphony No. 7, Opus 92; and Strauss Ein Heldenleben, Opus 40.

Conducting from memory, Leinsdorf gave the Fidelio a sure and precise reading. It was good to hear this overture, which one generally hears only at a performance of the Opera.

Attacking the Seventh at a good pace, and with only the very briefest pauses between the movements emphasized the unity of the work which Beethoven no doubt intended. Without losing the singing quality of the slow movement, the whole work marched steadily forward to the stirring climax of the finale.

Honoring the centennial of his birth, Strauss' Hero's Life was very heroic indeed. The noisy battle was made even fiercer by contrast with Joseph Silverstein's sensitive and poignant playing of the violin solo passages.

My colleague of the Journal reviewing staff this week, Gordon Crane of Columbia University — a nit-picking musicologist and a professional Manhattanite, although he lives in Brooklyn — even said the Boston Orchestra had played well. This is high praise from him. The present reviewer had no complaints whatever.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Monitor
Eve. Circ. 174,093

AUG 24 1964

Stokowski greeted

Tanglewood finale

By John Marshall Cuno

Lenox, Mass.

The season is over at Tanglewood. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf brought the eight-week Berkshire Festival to a close Sunday afternoon at the Music Shed with the playing of Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and Symphony No. 7 in A, and Strauss's "Ein Heldenben."

It was the centennial year of the birth of Richard Strauss, the 27th season of Tanglewood, and the second year for Mr. Leinsdorf as music director of the Berkshire Festival.

A most significant single offering of the final weekend was Mr. Leinsdorf's interpretation Saturday evening of the Verdi Requiem, a work of a awesome reverence, beauty, and dramatic power. Much of the awesomeness and dramatic power were there in Mr. Leinsdorf's dynamic interpretation. Some of the beauty and reverence came through in spite of that interpretation.

A steamroller dynamism tended to flatten the work and interfere with its natural momentum. Especially after each enormous crescendo, one wondered if the orchestra, the Chorus Pro Musica, and the Festival Chorus were going to get back, figuratively, upon their feet again. The work was enervated somewhat by dull and static moments following the storms and stresses. The effect was that of too-sudden silences and diminished grandeur.

The beautiful voices deserve credit. Ezio Flagello, bass, and Lili Chookasian, contralto, were particularly rewarding to hear: Miss Chookasian with her rich, dramatically sustained tones; Mr. Flagello with his buoyancy and sense of balance. Both have natural, beautiful tone color.

The other two soloists, clearly professional, are not to be discounted. However, they were at times perplexing. Mr. Shirley could sing with persuasive clarity and beauty one moment and with a muddled indefiniteness the next.

Control was not always apparent in Miss Amara's interpretation. Capability was there, but so was superficiality, and the two don't make good traveling companions. Some of her dynamic effects were almost brashly startling.

A beautiful thing happened at Tanglewood Friday evening, when Leopold Stokowski came to the podium as guest conductor. For a change the atmosphere was not charged with such deliberate intensity. Instead one felt freedom, tranquillity, and an unlabored power. There was warmth in the presence of such dignity, humility, and experience.

One hears truly inspired conducting when he hears Mr. Stokowski. Furthermore, one knows it. There is no question in one's mind this is genuineness—even genius.

When the Stokowski strengths are unleashed, they come to the mind and the heart as well as to the ear, and they come with triumph and joy.

We heard Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante in E flat, and it is worth reporting that the horns negotiated the difficult trills and passages in a way that added loveliness to the work. For the strings there are deeply rich and smooth flowing passages.

Everywhere present was the Stokowski sense of fluency and grace. In the conducting it is accomplished with appealing restraint and economy of motion. The wrist can describe what the entire arm would in another conductor.

On the program Friday were also the Strauss "Tod und Verklarung," pulled together by the conductor with a marvelous unanimity; works by Hovhaness and Rorem, both former Berkshire Music Center students (Alan Hovhaness came to the stage for bows after his work was performed), and Stravinsky's brilliant suite from the ballet "Petrouchka." The program had variety, color, and seemed to impart glorious exaltation of life itself. Largely responsible was the influence of the man Stokowski.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Sunday Republican
Sun. Circ. 114,397

AUG 23 1964

CHORUS LENDS GRANDEUR TO VERDI MUSIC

'Manzoni Requiem' Fills Air as Leinsdorf Conducts

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The spiritual grandeur of Verdi's vast Manzoni Requiem filled the Shed and soared over the wet lawns of Tanglewood Saturday night. The he[illegible]pted after the first few muted measures as if on cue and drove the lawn dwellers under umbrellas and into the Shed. The gatekeepers had counted 8438 listeners.

Leinsdorf Conducts

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 191 voices of the combined Chorus Pro Musica of Boston and the Berkshire Festival Chorus and four soloists from the Metropolitan Opera Company: Lucine Amara, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; George Shirley, tenor, and Ezio Flagello, bass.

So many superlatives have been written about this great requiem, it would be senseless to attempt new ones except to describe the performance.

Leinsdorf conducted from memory and placed the soloists behind the orchestra in front of the chorus. From that vantagepoint they could look directly at him and even though well back from the podium they had no trouble projecting their voices throughout the great shed. How they could be he on the lawns was of no importance Saturday.

Powerfully Expressive

Inside the shed the chorus drove its exultant power, as in the "Dies Irae" and "Sanctus" into the corners and through the rafters as if Saturday really were the "day of wrath," and the soloists, especially when joined in combinations as in the quartet "Rex Remendaue" and the soprano-mezzo-soprano duet "Recordare," were continuously and powerfully expressive.

The requiem is great music, and the forces at Tanglewood gave it a great performance. The applause lasted eight minutes and 20 seconds . . . which is a lot.

The requiem was so impressive it nearly blotted out the memory of the "ride of the Valkyries," that opened the program. That rouser and two other excerpts (22 minutes) from Wagner's "Die Walkure" preceded intermission. Flagello was the soloist and a right powerful chief god of Valhalla he was, too.

At 2.30 this afternoon the 1964 festival will end with performances of Beethoven's Overture to "Fielio," Op 72, and Symphony No. 7 Op. 92, and Strauss' tone poem "Ein Heldenleben."

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
[illegible] 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499

AUG 24 1964

Climax At Tanglewood

The climax of the final weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood came with the performance of Verdi's Requiem Mass, Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony. Despite the thunder and rain, which for those in the shed merely added to the excitement of the music, a capacity crowd of 8,438 attended.

The opening measures of the Requiem immediately revealed one of the chief attributes of the performance — a perfect balance of chorus and orchestra. The chorus, composed of the resident Berkshire Festival Chorus and the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston, numbered about 195, which is 70 more than the chorus Verdi himself directed for the first performance of the work. However, the effect of this large body of singers was not one of unrestrained chaos, as we find in many recordings of the Requiem. The diction of the initial Requiem aeternam was pure, while the violin melody in this opening piece floated above everything as a separate voice. In the passionate choral moments of the Requiem — the shockingly emotional Dies Irae, the laudatory Santus — the chorus was unleased in full expression of its power.

The four soloists of the Verdi Requiem are well-seasoned members of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Most impressive among these were contralto, Lili Chookasian, and bass, Ezio Flagello, both of whom performed the work with the dramatic impact that Verdi intended with his "Sacred Opera." Flagello's "Confutatis" section of the Dies Irae sequence inspired terror likening it to Michelangelo's depiction of the Last Judgment. Chookasian was brilliant in each of her solo phrases. The remainder of the quartet was made up by soprano, Lucine Amara, and tenor, George Shirley. Both of these singers had exceptionally beautiful moments in the work. Amara's voice seemed thin at times in contrast with Chookasian's powerfully broad voice, but the discrepancy was not great enough to mar the sweetness of theor "Recordare" duet. Alone, Amara was memorable for her sustained phrases and perfectly placed high notes in the "Requiem aternam" theme of the final Libera me. Her attempt, however, to shift into a middle range after the latter phrases, a difficult feat for any Verdian soprano, proved sadly disappointing. Shirley, too, left a favorable impression on the listener with his breathtaking "Ingemisco" solo, a follow-up to the "Recordare" which piled beauty upon beauty. The blend here of oboe obbligato and voice created a balanced dramatic aria. In this number and in the "Hostias" of the Domine Jesu, the listener was made aware of Shirley's technical ability to perform with ease the impossible trills of Verdi's vocal line. It was in ensemble that Shirley was weakest, especially noticeable in the Lux Aeterna trio of mezzo-soprano, tenor, and bass. It may be true, however, that had the four soloists been placed in front of the orchestra rather than behind it, a clearer picture of the vocal combination might have been received. On the whole, nevertheless, the entire performance was excellently constructed and as exciting emotionally as Verdi intended it to be. — J.M.W.

Post
WALLINGFORD, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,623

AUG 27 1964

Last Tanglewood Reviews

Friday Evening
By J.G.B.

It was exciting to observe the complete control over the orchestra which old Stokowski exercised at this formal festival concert. That he is able to assemble such a good is, of course, not new; that he is an extravagant showman, that he can elicit sense exciting beloved sounds from his men, that he can elicit terrific climaxes with a flick of the wrist a response that other conductors seem to feel only at times the most extravagant sense from the body English.

The youthful approach of Stokowski's approach was entirely appropriate to the music he had selected. The Mozart Sinfonia Concertante in E Flat was written when the composer was 22; Death and Transfiguration, when Strauss was 26; Petrouchka when Stravinsky was 29.

Alan Hovhaness, on the other hand, was a comparatively advanced 44 when he composed his Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, and Ned Rorem, whose Eagles was performed, a respectable 35. It is no adverse criticism of these two Americans to note that their scores do not measure up in stature or inspiration to those of the older masters. Both are small-scale works.

The Hovhaness, however, is a thoroughly professional job, and I should enjoy hearing it again. The Mozart was beautifully performed, and the small orchestra maintaining a perfect balance with the skillful soloists. Both the Strauss and the Stravinsky sounded brand-new.

Saturday Evening
By G.F.C.

It was an interesting idea to pit the two giants of 19th Century music drama, Wagner and Verdi, against each other. In advance it looked strange, yet somehow it worked well. The lyrical Wagner excerpt nicely offset the frequently furious intensity of the Verdi, and any of the now dated criticism of the Requiem on grounds of its theatricality was averted by placing it in a context that was frankly theatrical.

Mr. Leinsdorf's performance of Wotan's Farewell stressed the long line without imposing superfluous accents or effects. Ezio Flagello, as Wotan, rode out the flood of orchestral sound with great beauty of tone but rather less involvement in Wotan's personal drama than might be desirable in the opera house.

The performance of the Verdi Requiem was stupendous. The soloists, for the most part, were excellent. Mr. Flagello's large voice was best suited to the size of the performing forces, and he sang with greater involvement than in the Wagner. George Shirley is a lyric, rather than heroic, tenor. There was a trace of strain in the more forceful passages, but great beauty and sensitivity in the quieter ones.

Lili Chookasian's dark, rich contralto was perfectly used for both solo and ensemble passages. Lucine Amara, on the other hand, was too bright a soprano for a cohesive blending of the solo quartet. The large chorus sang with distinction, and Mr. Leinsdorf merits every accolade for an inspired performance.

Sunday Afternoon
By J.W.H.

The 1964 season at Tanglewood came to a splendid close on Sunday afternoon with the Boston Symphony's music director, Erich Leinsdorf, conducting Beethoven's Overture to Fidelio, Opus 72; the Symphony No. 7. Opus 92; and Strauss Ein Heldenleben, Opus 40.

Conducting from memory, Leinsdorf gave the Fidelio a sure and precise reading. It was good to hear this overture, which one generally hears only at a performance of the Opera.

Attacking the Seventh at a good pace, and with only the very briefest pauses between the movements emphasized the unity of the work which Beethoven no doubt intended. Without losing the singing quality of the slow movement. the whole work marched steadily forward to the stirring climax of the finale.

Honoring the centennial of his birth, Strauss' Hero's Life was very heroic indeed. The noisy battle was made even fiercer by contrast with Joseph Silverstein's sensitive and poignant playing of the violin solo passages.

My colleague of the Journal reviewing staff this week, Gordon Crane of Columbia University — a nit-picking musicologist and a professional Manhattanite, although he lives in Brooklyn — even said the Boston Orchestra had played well. This is high praise from him. The present reviewer had no complaints whatever.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499

AUG 24 1964

Climax At Tanglewood

The climax of the final weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood came with the performance of Verdi's Requiem Mass, Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony. Despite the thunder and rain, which for those in the shed merely added to the excitement of the music, a capacity crowd of 8,438 attended.

The opening measures of the Requiem immediately revealed one of the chief attributes of the performance — a perfect balance of chorus and orchestra. The chorus, composed of the resident Berkshire Festival Chorus and the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston, numbered about 195, which is 70 more than the chorus Verdi himself directed for the first performance of the work. However, the effect of this large body of singers was not one of unrestrained chaos, as we find in many recordings of the Requiem. The diction of the initial Requiem aeternam was pure, while the violin melody in this opening piece floated above everything as a separate voice. In the passionate choral moments of the Requiem — the shockingly emotional Dies Irae, the laudatory Sanctus — the chorus was released in full expression of its power.

The four soloists of the Verdi Requiem are well-seasoned members of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Most impressive among these were contralto, Lili Chookasian, and bass, Ezio Flagello, both of whom performed the work with the dramatic impact that Verdi intended with his "Sacred Opera." Flagello's "Confutatis" section of the Dies Irae sequence inspired terror likening it to Michelangelo's depiction of the Last Judgment. Chookasian was brilliant in each of her solo phrases. The remainder of the quartet was made up by soprano, Lucine Amara, and tenor, George Shirley. Both of these singers had exceptionally beautiful moments in the work. Amara's voice seemed thin at times in contrast with Chookasian's powerfully broad voice but the discrepancy was not great enough to mar the sweetness of theor "Recordare" duet. Alone, Amara was memorable for her sustained phrases and perfectly placed high notes in the "Requiem aternam" theme of the final Libera me. Her attempt, however, to shift into a middle range after the latter phrases, a difficult feat for any Verdian soprano, proved sadly disappointing. Shirley, too, left a favorable impression on the listener with his breathtaking "Ingemisco" solo, a follow-up to the "Recordare" which piled beauty upon beauty. The blend here of oboe obbligato and voice created a balanced dramatic aria. In this number and in the "Hostias" of the Domine Jesu, the listener was made aware of Shirley's technical ability to perform with ease the impossible trills of Verdi's vocal line. It was in emsemble that Shirley was weakest, especially noticeable in the Lux aeterna trio of mezzo-soprano, tenor, and bass. It may be true, however, that had the four soloists been placed in front of the orchestra rather than behind it, a clearer picture of the vocal combination might have been received. On the whole, nevertheless, the entire performance was excellently constructed and as exciting emotionally as Verdi intended it to be. — J.M.W.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Monitor
Eve. Circ. 174,093

AUG 24 1964

Stokowski greeted

Tanglewood finale

By John Marshall Cuno

Lenox, Mass.

The season is over at Tanglewood. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf brought the eight-week Berkshire Festival to a close Sunday afternoon at the Music Shed with the playing of Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and Symphony No. 7 in A, and Strauss's "Ein Heldenben."

It was the centennial year of the birth of Richard Strauss, the 27th season of Tanglewood, and the second year for Mr. Leinsdorf as music director of the Berkshire Festival.

A most significant single offering of the final weekend was Mr. Leinsdorf's interpretation Saturday evening of the Verdi Requiem, a work of a awesome reverence, beauty, and dramatic power. Much of the awesomeness and dramatic power were there in Mr. Leinsdorf's dynamic interpretation. Some of the beauty and reverence came through in spite of that interpretation.

A steamroller dynamism tended to flatten the work and interfere with its natural momentum. Especially after each enormous crescendo, one wondered if the orchestra, the Chorus Pro Musica, and the Festival Chorus were going to get back, figuratively, upon their feet again. The work was enervated somewhat by dull and static moments following the storms and stresses. The effect was that of too-sudden silences and diminished grandeur.

The beautiful voices deserve credit. Ezio Flagello, bass, and Lili Chookasian, contralto, were particularly rewarding to hear: Miss Chookasian with her rich, dramatically sustained tones; Mr. Flagello with his buoyancy and sense of balance. Both have natural, beautiful tone color.

The other two soloists, clearly professional, are not to be discounted. However, they were at times perplexing. Mr. Shirley could sing with persuasive clarity and beauty one moment and with a muddled indefiniteness the next.

Control was not always apparent in Miss Amara's interpretation. Capability was there, but so was superficiality, and the two don't make good traveling companions. Some of her dynamic effects were almost brashly startling.

A beautiful thing happened at Tanglewood Friday evening, when Leopold Stokowski came to the podium as guest conductor. For a change the atmosphere was not charged with such deliberate intensity. Instead one felt freedom, tranquillity, and an unlabored power. There was warmth in the presence of such dignity, humility, and experience.

One hears truly inspired conducting when he hears Mr. Stokowski. Furthermore, one knows it. There is no question in one's mind this is genuineness—even genius.

When the Stokowski strengths are unleashed, they come to the mind and the heart as well as to the ear, and they come with triumph and joy.

We heard Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante in E flat, and it is worth reporting that the horns negotiated the difficult trills and passages in a way that added loveliness to the work. For the strings there are deeply rich and smooth flowing passages.

Everywhere present was the Stokowski sense of fluency and grace. In the conducting it is accomplished with appealing restraint and economy of motion. The wrist can describe what the entire arm would in another conductor.

On the program Friday were also the Strauss "Tod und Verklarung," pulled together by the conductor with a marvelous unanimity; works by Hovhaness and Rorem, both former Berkshire Music Center students (Alan Hovhaness came to the stage for bows after his work was performed), and Stravinsky's brilliant suite from the ballet "Petrouchka." The program had variety, color, and seemed to impart glorious exaltation of life itself. Largely responsible was the influence of the man Stokowski.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Sunday Republican
Sun. Circ. 114,397

AUG 23 1964

CHORUS LENDS GRANDEUR TO VERDI MUSIC

'Manzoni Requiem' Fills Air as Leinsdorf Conducts

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The spiritual grandeur of Verdi's vast Manzoni Requiem filled the Shed and soared over the wet lawns of Tanglewood Saturday night. The he[illegible]pted after the first few muted measures as if on cue and drove the lawn dwellers under umbrellas and into the Shed. The gatekeepers had counted 8438 listeners.

Leinsdorf Conducts

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 193 voices of the combined Chorus Pro Musica of Boston and the Berkshire Festival Chorus and four soloists from the Metropolitan Opera Company: Lucine Amara, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; George Shirley, tenor, and Ezio Flagello, bass.

So many superlatives have been written about this great requiem, it would be senseless to attempt new ones except to describe the performance.

Leinsdorf conducted from memory and placed the soloists behind the orchestra in front of the chorus. From that vantagepoint they could look directly at him and even though well back from the podium they had no trouble projecting their voices throughout the great shed. How they could be he on the lawns was of no importance Saturday.

Powerfully Expressive

Inside the shed the chorus drove its exultant power, as in the "Dies Irae" and "Sanctus" into the corners and through the rafters as if Saturday really were the "day of wrath," and the soloists, especially when joined in combinations as in the quartet "Rex Remendaue" and the soprano-mezzo-soprano duet "Recordare," were continuously and powerfully expressive.

The requiem is great music and the forces at Tanglewood gave it a great performance. The applause lasted eight minutes and 30 seconds . . . which is a lot.

The requiem was so impressive it nearly blotted out the memory of the "ride of the Valkyries," that opened the program. That rouser and two other excerpts (22 minutes) from Wagner's "Die Walkure" preceded intermission. Flagello was the soloist and a right powerful chief god of Valhalla he was, too.

At 2.30 this afternoon the 1964 festival will end with performances of Beethoven's Overture to "Fielio," Op 72, and Symphony No. 7 Op. 92, and Strauss' tone poem "Ein Heldenleben."

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

HARTFORD, CONN.
Courant
Morn. Circ. 124,441

AUG 24 1964

By GEORGE W. STOWE
Times Music Critic

LENOX, Mass.—Verdi's "Requiem," unbelievable as it may seem, had never been programmed at Tanglewood until Saturday night when it was given a performance that will live long in this reviewer's memory, a performance that had many moments that were both electrifying and richly satisfying.

Although it is not a work that I would necessarily associate with Erich Leinsdorf, the conductor of the Boston Symphony demonstrated such an awesome command of the musical forces at his disposal that I would rank Saturday night's reading among the great performances, something to stand up to the efforts of Toscanini and Tullio Serafin, among others.

* * *

THE SOLO QUARTET — Lucine Amara, Lili Chookasian, George Shirley, and Ezio Flagello—was unquestionably the finest ensemble that I have heard in the so-called "Manzoni" Requiem. Flagello's rolling basso is a thrilling voice, perhaps not as moving in the "Confutatis Maledictis" as that of Pinza in his prime, but always idiomatic and rich sounding.

George Shirley, another Metropolitan confrere of Flagello, literally sang like an angel, particularly in the famous "Ingemisco," in which his control recalled that of the late Jussi Bjoerling. Even Toscanini seldom had the benefit of such a fine tenor.

In her mezzo solos Lili Chookasian had just enough metal and Italianate fervor in her voice to make her performance thrilling to the ear and to the sense of the text. And Lucine Amara, who was the least impressive at the beginning, rose to the occasion in the Libera Me, which was full of poignance and feeling. The ensemble sound was exemplary.

* * *

THE DIES IRAE Saturday night was quite overwhelming. Leinsdorf reinforced the percussion section and the Boston brass players, both onstage and at the side of the Music Shed, demonstrated their unerring skills. And a thunderstorm outside the Shed brought a coinciding bolt of lighting just at the moment when the last statement of the Dies Irae motif was given.

For the first half Leinsdorf offered excerpts from Act Three of Wagner's "Die Walkure," including "The Ride of the Valkyries," the "Magic Fire Music," and "Wotan's Farewell." Mr. Flagello was the resonant-voiced Wotan for this performance, and Mr. Leinsdorf, who had conducted this music many times at the Metropolitan, gave it a warmly satisfying recreation.

Some 8,500 persons attended this concert. For the Verdi Requiem, the Festival Chorus, augmented by the Chorus Pro Musica under Alfred Nash Patterson, lent staunch and cohesive support.

David Wells and Raymond Hanson, in the first of two programs devoted to Beethoven's works for cello and piano, explored a segment of the composer's creative output that is comparatively unfamiliar to the general public.

And it was pleasant to report that a respectably large audience turned out for this affair Sunday evening in Millard Auditorium on the campus of the University of Hartford. It was heartening and doubly so because of the dismal, rainy weather.

* * *

BEETHOVEN'S Twelve Variations on a Theme from Handel's "Judas Maccabeus" is certainly minor Beethoven, some fairly conventional variations. However, it was an excellent showcase for the artistic talents of these collaborators, who probably gave it a more polished reading than it deserved.

In the composer's initial sonata for this combination, the Sonata in F major (Op. 5, No. 1), there is a surprising emotional scope. This is definitely music for the concert stage and not the salon. The writing is dramatically conceived and although there is no slow movement, the music speaks with a ruggedly individual voice.

* * *

WELLS AND HANSON were both in excellent form, the balance was good, and the interpretative approach was sensitive and probing. Both men have the solid technical command of their instruments that allows them to concentrate on the interpretative aspects of the music, which always makes the music-making more palatable.

For my taste Beethoven's Variations on "Bei Mannern" from Mozart's "Magic Flute" are the finest thing he has done in this form.

There is something so characteristically Mozartean in the character of this music that one might have thought that the earlier composer had created the variations on his own theme. Fortunately, the mood was beautifully captured in the performance last night. Actually, this was the highlight of the evening.

* * *

THE COMPOSER'S final sonata for this combination (his Op. 102, No. 2) is perhaps the most introspective. Certainly the slow movement has a poignant and soul-searing beauty, something that was sensitively realized in the performance last night. And the transition to the final Allegro fugato was a miracle of recreation.

My only reservation about last night's performance was my own inability to hear the lower register of the cello in its proper perspective. Whether this was the fault of the acoustics or a deficiency in Mr. Wells' instrument I do not know.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711

AUG 24 1964

od Leinsdorf Absorbing With Verdi Requiem

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX—No question, Erich Leinsdorf's performance of the Verdi Requiem on the Saturday night of the final Tanglewood week-end was the best thing to have happened here this Summer. It is also the most distinguished achievement of interpretation I have heard from Mr. Leinsdorf here or elsewhere.

The Requiem was preceded by excerpts from Act III of Wagner's "Die Walkuere," specifically the Ride—with cuts that help only in so far as they shorten the misery—and from the beginning of Wotan's farewell to Bruennhilde until the end of the act. Wotan's lines were sung sonorously and expressively by Ezio Flagello, and Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony produced an ideally beautiful statement of the orchestral part.

Impressive as the Wagner was, it was the Requiem that made the evening so memorable. The piece itself is so extraordinary in the way it embodies all the vigor and all of the refinement of Verdi's later style within the framework of the most elaborately thought out interpretation of its text that we have.

I am quite sure that not since Toscanini has a conductor given so carefully considered an interpretation of the Requiem, one so disposed to take the work altogether seriously and to bring out its musical values. I have heard good performances of the work in recent years, but in retrospect they seem like effective improvisations compared to the best of what Leinsdorf gave Saturday.

The solo quartet, with whom a performance stands or falls as much as with the conductor consisted of Lucine Amara, Lili Chookasian, George Shirley and Ezio Flagello. Someone had obviously been after Miss Amara about dynamics, accents, rhythms, with the result that she was inclined to exaggerate details beyond what the context could bear. In general she was effective, often quite fiery. Miss Chookasian sang with grand sound and impressive drama.

Mr. Shirley did the best singing of the evening and the worst. His phrasing is worked out according to Verdi's composition, not the customary tenorial subterfuges, and not even from Bjoerling or Peerce have I heard the Ingemisco or Hostias sung so beautifully. At other times he had pitch problems, though, and he did more than his share of making the unaccompanied ensembles unintelligible.

Flagello's nobly eloquent singing was the most consistently distinquished work of the evening.

Let me reemphasize that even with its limitations, Leinsdorf's performance of the Verdi Requiem was one of clarity, musical honesty and strength, and it was a completely absorbing experience.

From an extramusical point of view, one of the most impressive moments was the very real thunder and lightning that accompanied the last occurrence of the Dies Irae. The effect was unforgettable. Of course Mr. Leinsdorf's White House connections have been well publicized, but we had not realized the extent of his influence.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304

AUG 27 1964

YOUR WORLD OF OPERA

By WILLIAM D. MIRANDA

VERDI AT TANGLEWOOD

Even the heavens blessed the occasion with a thunder and lightning tribute on cue at the final repetition of the Dies irae, and what could be more exciting for an opera lover this summer than the Tanglewood premiere of the Verdi Requiem, that awe-inspiring tribute to Alessandro Manzoni, patriot extraordinary. Couched in operatic terms this monumental statement of Verdi's faith and respect has fortunately awaited the coming to Boston of a conductor with an operatic portfolio as well as a symphonic one. The acoustics of the music shed, the magnificent swell of the two hundred-voice double chorus and the thrill of the festival atmosphere, all combined to send an enraptured audience home exulting in the grandeur of Verdi a la Leinsdorf.

The promise on paper was more than fulfilled, for here was a performance of the Requiem Mass more operatic than ever before, with the exquisite melodic line always paramount and singing for joy. To the credit of the conductor, chorus director Alfred Nash Patterson (whose Chorus Pro Musica made up half the choral forces), and chorus masters Florence Dunn and Thomas Sokol, the gigantic company never sounded fuzzy, but was always perfectly controlled and not even the tiniest bit unmusical, even in the awesome swells of Sanctus and Dies irae.

No operatic orchestra could be called upon to equal the musicianship displayed by the Boston Symphony at this final evening concert of the Tanglewood Season. The soloists on the other hand were variable. The now svelte soprano Lucine Amara sang pianissimi of incredible beauty and infused the Recordare with deep emotion.

No less authoritative was mezzo Lili Chookasian who shone in the Liber scriptus and led the eloquent Lux aeterna.

George Shirley, though hampered by being much out of voice, displayed a faultless taste and conception of the tenor part that was on a high artistic level. Ezio Flagello was out of his best bass climate, that of buffo or simple cantante roles. His delivery tends to be dry, indistinct, and monotonous.

The concert began with three excerpts from Die Walkure's Act III. Though Leinsdorf, who cut his conducting teeth on Wagner, is certainly justly admired for his comprehension of such music, this was less than a memorable performance. Without wishmaidens, the Ride of the Valkyries is just a lot of thrilling sound, which it was last week. While the Wotan Farewell was touching and nobly commanding in the orchestra, Mr. Flagello lacked top, bottom, and legato smoothness for any kind of positive impression as Wotan. The Magic Fire Music was marred by a distinctly less than fiery tempo.

This operatic program might be a happy pacesetter for the upcoming B.S.O. season. Certainly the Requiem could stand a hearing of such dimension in Symphony Hall, and prospective purchasers of a recording of that masterpiece might be advised that one by Leinsdorf and his forces is in the planning stages.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

SPT 5 1964

In the Tanglewood Shed on Saturday (22), the agile, sleight man with the large hands had worked like a fencing master. For over an hour he had parried, weaved and lunged in the calm and exacting manner of a man bent upon victory by perfection. He succeeded. When the last note of the Requiem had sounded, the audience gave Erich Leindsorf an ovation of immeasurable intensity. In total, Leinsdorf and the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston took eight "curtain calls."

Under the conductor's demands, the four soloists, assisted by the Festival chorus and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had sung with impact and magnificent tonal control. And Leinsdorf had utilized Verdi's dramatic resources to the utmost. From the composer's powerful, somber "sacred opera," he had created a definitive work of art.

In this work, as in Verdi's operas, soloists get ample opportunity. The composer makes the voices the prominent factors. The four soloists, Lucine Amara, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; George Shirley, tenor; and Ezio Flagello, bass, made the most of it. Miss Chookasian combined artistry and vocal brilliance in "Quid sum miser."

Miss Amara stood out in "Requiem aeternam." Her high notes were absolutely astounding. George Shirley introduced the "Kyrie" with vitality and deepness of tone. Flagello's voice carried with authority. His "Confutatis" was done extremely well.

In Verdi's work, the appeal for mercy is the keynote of the entire composition. In this memorial to a dear friend, Allesando Manjoni, the composer painted a horrible picture in which countless souls cry out for salvation and liberty. Leinsdorf flogs these souls, making the work all the more beautiful.

On Sunday, as a fitting climax to the season's finale, Leinsdorf led the orchestra in Beethoven's "Overture to Fidelio" and the composer's "Symphony No. 7." Leinsdorf chose Richard Strauss' tone poem "Ein Heldenleben" (Hero's Life) to be last on the program. Actually, the "Hero's Life" is a symphony. It is played without pauses. However, there are parts which are turbulent while others are calm. Leinsdorf records for RCA Victor.

For six musicians this was just not the end of another Tanglewood season (the 30th). Joseph de Pasquale, first viola; Samuel Mayes, first cello and Winifred Winograd, of the cello section, are leaving to join the Philadelphia Orchestra. Three are retiring: Louis Speyer, English horn soloist; Vladimir Resnikoff, of first violin section, and Jean de Vergie, oboist.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

HARTFORD, CONN.
Courant
Morn. Circ. 124,441

AUG 24 1964

By GEORGE W. STOWE
Times Music Critic

LENOX, Mass.—Verdi's "Requiem," unbelievable as it may seem, had never been programmed at Tanglewood until Saturday night when it was given a performance that will live long in this reviewer's memory, a performance that had many moments that were both electrifying and richly satisfying.

Although it is not a work that I would necessarily associate with Erich Leinsdorf, the conductor of the Boston Symphony demonstrated such an awesome command of the musical forces at his disposal that I would rank Saturday night's reading among the great performances, something to stand up to the efforts of Toscanini and Tullio Serafin, among others.

* * *

THE SOLO QUARTET — Lucine Amara, Lili Chookasian, George Shirley, and Ezio Flagello—was unquestionably the finest ensemble that I have heard in the so-called "Manzoni" Requiem. Flagello's rolling basso is a thrilling voice, perhaps not as moving in the "Confutatis Maledictis" as that of Pinza in his prime, but always idiomatic and rich sounding.

George Shirley, another Metropolitan confrere of Flagello, literally sang like an angel, particularly in the famous "Ingemisco," in which his control recalled that of the late Jussi Bjoerling. Even Toscanini seldom had the benefit of such a fine tenor.

In her mezzo solos Lili Chookasian had just enough metal and Italianate fervor in her voice to make her performance thrilling to the ear and to the sense of the text. And Lucine Amara, who was the least impressive at the beginning, rose to the occasion in the Libera Me, which was full of poignance and feeling. The ensemble sound was exemplary.

* * *

THE DIES IRAE Saturday night was quite overwhelming. Leinsdorf reinforced the percussion section and the Boston brass players, both onstage and at the side of the Music Shed, demonstrated their unerring skills. And a thunderstorm outside the Shed brought a coinciding bolt of lighting just at the moment when the last statement of the Dies Irae motif was given.

For the first half Leinsdorf offered excerpts from Act Three of Wagner's "Die Walkure," including "The Ride of the Valkyries," the "Magic Fire Music," and "Wotan's Farewell." Mr. Flagello was the resonant-voiced Wotan for this performance, and Mr. Leinsdorf, who had conducted this music many times at the Metropolitan, gave it a warmly satisfying recreation.

Some 8,500 persons attended this concert. For the Verdi Requiem, the Festival Chorus, augmented by the Chorus Pro Musica under Alfred Nash Patterson, lent staunch and cohesive support.

David Wells and Raymond Hanson, in the first of two programs devoted to Beethoven's works for cello and piano, explored a segment of the composer's creative output that is comparatively unfamiliar to the general public.

And it was pleasant to report that a respectably large audience turned out for this affair Sunday evening in Millard Auditorium on the campus of the University of Hartford. It was heartening and doubly so because of the dismal, rainy weather.

* * *

BEETHOVEN'S Twelve Variations on a Theme from Handel's "Judas Maccabeus" is certainly minor Beethoven, some fairly conventional variations. However, it was an excellent showcase for the artistic talents of these collaborators, who probably gave it a more polished reading than it deserved.

In the composer's initial sonata for this combination, the Sonata in F major (Op. 5, No. 1), there is a surprising emotional scope. This is definitely music for the concert stage and not the salon. The writing is dramatically conceived and although there is no slow movement, the music speaks with a ruggedly individual voice.

* * *

WELLS AND HANSON were both in excellent form, the balance was good, and the interpretative approach was sensitive and probing. Both men have the solid technical command of their instruments that allows them to concentrate on the interpretative aspects of the music, which always makes the music-making more palatable.

For my taste Beethoven's Variations on "Bei Mannern" from Mozart's "Magic Flute" are the finest thing he has done in this form.

There is something so characteristically Mozartean in the character of this music that one might have thought that the earlier composer had created the variations on his own theme. Fortunately, the mood was beautifully captured in the performance last night. Actually, this was the highlight of the evening.

* * *

THE COMPOSER'S final sonata for this combination (his Op. 102, No. 2) is perhaps the most introspective. Certainly the slow movement has a poignant and soul-searing beauty, something that was sensitively realized in the performance last night. And the transition to the final Allegro fugato was a miracle of recreation.

My only reservation about last night's performance was my own inability to hear the lower register of the cello in its proper perspective. Whether this was the fault of the acoustics or a deficiency in Mr. Wells' instrument I do not know.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711

AUG 24 1964

od Leinsdorf Absorbing With Verdi Requiem

By M[illegible] STEINBERG

LENOX—No question, Erich Leinsdorf's performance of the Verdi Requiem on the Saturday night of the final Tanglewood week-end was the best thing to have happened here this Summer. It is also the most distinguished achievement of interpretation I have heard from Mr. Leinsdorf here or elsewhere.

The Requiem was preceded by excerpts from Act III of Wagner's "Die Walkuere," specifically the Ride—with cuts that help only in so far as they shorten the misery—and from the beginning of Wotan's farewell to Bruennhilde until the end of the act. Wotan's lines were sung sonorously and expressively by Ezio Flagello, and Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony produced an ideally beautiful statement of the orchestral part.

Impressive as the Wagner was, it was the Requiem that made the evening so memorable. The piece itself is so extraordinary in the way it embodies all the vigor and all of the refinement of Verdi's later style within the framework of the most elaborately thought out interpretation of its text that we have.

I am quite sure that not since Toscanini has a conductor given so carefully considered an interpretation of the Requiem, one so disposed to take the work altogether seriously and to bring out its musical values. I have heard good performances of the work in recent years, but in retrospect they seem like effective improvisations compared to the best of what Leinsdorf gave Saturday.

The solo quartet, with whom a performance stands or falls as much as with the conductor, consisted of Lucine Amara, Lili Chookasian, George Shirley and Ezio Flagello. Someone had obviously been after Miss Amara about dynamics, accents, rhythms, with the result that she was inclined to exaggerate details beyond what the context could bear. In general she was effective, often quite fiery. Miss Chookasian sang with grand sound and impressive drama.

Mr. Shirley did the best singing of the evening and the worst. His phrasing is worked out according to Verdi's com[illegible] not the customary tenorial subterfuges, and not even from Bjoerling or Peerce have I heard the Ingemisco or Hostias sung so beautifully. At other times he had pitch problems, though, and he did more than his share of making the unaccompanied ensembles unintelligible.

Flagello's nobly eloquent singing was the most consistently distinguished work of the evening.

Let me reemphasize that even with its limitations, Leinsdorf's performance of the Verdi Requiem was one of clarity, musical honesty and strength, and it was a completely absorbing experience.

From an extramusical point of view, one of the most impressive moments was the very real thunder and lightning that accompanied the last occurrence of the Dies Irae. The effect was unforgettable. Of course Mr. Leinsdorf's White House connections have been well publicized, but we had not realized the extent of his influence.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304

AUG 27 1964

YOUR WORLD OF OPERA

By WILLIAM D. MIRANDA

VERDI AT TANGLEWOOD

Even the heavens blessed the occasion with a thunder and lightning tribute on cue at the final repetition of the Dies irae, and what could be more exciting for an opera lover this summer than the Tanglewood premiere of the Verdi Requiem, that awe-inspiring tribute to Alessandro Manzoni, patriot extraordinary. Couched in operatic terms this monumental statement of Verdi's faith and respect has fortunately awaited the coming to Boston of a conductor with an operatic portfolio as well as a symphonic one. The acoustics of the music shed, the magnificent swell of the two hundred-voice double chorus and the thrill of the festival almosphere, all combined to send an enraptured audience home exulting in the grandeur of Verdi a la Leinsdorf.

The promise on paper was more than fulfilled, for here was a performance of the Requiem Mass more operatic than ever before, with the exquisite melodic line always paramount and singing for joy. To the credit of the conductor, chorus director Alfred Nash Patterson (whose Chorus Pro Musica made up half the choral forces), and chorus masters Florence Dunn and Thomas Sokol, the gigantic company never sounded fuzzy, but was always perfectly controlled and not even the tiniest bit unmusical, even in the awesome swells of Sanctus and Dies irae.

No operatic orchestra could be called upon to equal the musicianship displayed by the Boston Symphony at this final evening concert of the Tanglewood Season. The soloists on the other hand were variable. The now svelte soprano Lucine Amara sang pianissimi of incredible beauty and infused the Recordare with deep emotion. No less authoritative was mezzo Lili Chookasian who shone in the Liber scriptus and led the eloquent Lux aeterna.

George Shirley, though hampered by being much out of voice, displayed a faultless taste and conception of the tenor part that was on a high artistic level. Ezio Flagello was out of his best bass climate, that of buffo or simple cantante roles. His delivery tends to be dry, indistinct, and monotonous.

The concert began with three excerpts from Die Walkure's Act III. Though Leinsdorf, who cut his conducting teeth on Wagner, is certainly justly admired for his comprehension of such music, this was less than a memorable performance. Without wishmaidens, the Ride of the Valkyries is just a lot of thrilling sound, which it was last week. While the Wotan Farewell was touching and nobly commanding in the orchestra, Mr. Flagello lacked top, bottom, and legato smoothness for any kind of positive impression as Wotan. The Magic Fire Music was marred by a distinctly less than fiery tempo.

This operatic program might be a happy pacesetter for the upcoming B.S.O. season. Certainly the Requiem could stand a hearing of such dimension in Symphony Hall, and prospective purchasers of a recording of that masterpiece might be advised that one by Leinsdorf and his forces is in the planning stages.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

SPT 5 1964

In the Tanglewood Shed on Saturday (22), the agile, sleight man with the large hands had worked like a fencing master. Hor over an hour he had parried, weaved and lunged in the calm and exacting manner of a man bent upon victory by perfection. He succeeded. When the last note of the Requiem had sounded, the audience gave Erich Leindsorf an ovation of immeasurable intensity. In total, Leinsdorf and the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston took eight "curtain calls."

Under the conductor's demands, the four soloists, assisted by the Festival chorus and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had sung with impact and magnificent tonal control. And Leinsdorf had utilized Verdi's dramatic resources to the utmost. From the composer's powerful, somber "sacred opera," he had created a definitive work of art.

In this work, as in Verdi's operas, soloists get ample opportunity. The composer makes the voices the prominent factors. The four soloists, Lucine Amara, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; George Shirley, tenor; and Ezio Flagello, bass, made the most of it. Miss Chookasian combined artistry and vocal brilliance in "Quid sum miser."

Miss Amara stood out in "Requiem aeternam." Her high notes were absolutely astounding. George Shirley introduced the "Kyrie" with vitality and deepness of tone. Flagello's voice [illegible] with [illegible]. His "Confutatis" was done extremely well.

In Verdi's work, the appeal for mercy is the keynote of the entire composition. In this memorial to a dear friend, Allesando Manjoni, the composer painted a horrible picture in which countless souls cry out for salvation and liberty. Leinsdorf flogs these souls, making the work all the more beautiful.

On Sunday, as a fitting climax to the season's finale, Leinsdorf led the orchestra in Beethoven's "Overture to Fidelio" and the composer's "Symphony No. 7." Leinsdorf chose Richard Strauss' tone poem "Ein Heldenleben" (Hero's Life) to be last on the program. Actually, the "Hero's Life" is a symphony. It is played without pauses. However, there are parts which are turbulent while others are calm. Leinsdorf records for RCA Victor.

For six musicians this was just not the end of another Tanglewood season (the 30th). Joseph de Pasquale, first viola; Samuel Mayes, first cello and Winifred Winograd, of the cello section, are leaving to join the Philadelphia Orchestra. Three are retiring: Louis Speyer, English horn soloist; Vladimir Resnikoff, of first violin section, and Jean de Vergie, oboist.

BLANK PAGE

CHAMBER CONCERTS

CAPITAL ... NEWS BUREAU
... N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
... NEW YORK SERVICE
... NEWS
... 15, 1964

CAPITAL ... NEWS BUREAU
... N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
... NEW YORK SERVICE
... COLLIER
... 30, 1964

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 161,219 SUN. 301,523

JUN 7 1964

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS COURIER
W. 15,200

JUN 13 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106

JUN 7 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105

JUN 7 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,093

JUN 9 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193

JUN 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397

JUN 7 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240

JUN 8 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586

JUN 7 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912

JUN 11 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111

JUN 9 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 128,545

JUN 20 1964

News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 100,582

JUN 8 1964

TANGLEWOOD PROGRAM IS ANNOUNCED

Eight Summer Programs to Take Place Tuesday Nights at 8

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, has announced the programs for the Festival Chamber Music Concerts this summer. The eight programs will take place on Tuesday nights at 8 in the theater at Tanglewood.

The New York Pro Musica, Noah Greenberg, musical director, will open the series on the 30th with an Elizabethan concert honoring William Shakespeare's 400th birthday. The ensemble of six singers and four instrumentalists will perform works by Byrd, Wilbye, Dowland, Morley, Hume, White and Jones.

On July 7 Joseph Silverstein, who is finishing his second season as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard in a violin recital assisted by Ralph Berkowitz at the piano. The program will consist of Schubert's Rondo Brillante, Op. 70; the Sonata in E flat minor by Strauss; and Beethoven's Sonata in E flat minor by Strauss; and Beethoven's Sonata in G major.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director, will present the Chamber Music Concert of July 14. They will sing works by Schutz, Schein, Bach, Poulenc, des Prez, Brahms, Mennin, Carter and Barber.

Claudio Arrau will play a piano recital of Mozart sonatas on July 21, performing the Sonata in G major, K. 283; Sonata in A minor, K. 310; Fantaisie and Sonata in C minor, K. 475 & 457; Sonata in B flat, K. 570; and Sonata in D major, K. 576.

On July 28 the Beaux Arts Trio of New York will be heard in Mozart's Trio in B flat, K. 254; Ravel's Trio in A minor; and the Trio in E minor, Op. 90 ("Dumky") by Dvorak.

Jorge Bolet will present a piano recital on the program of Aug. 4. He will plan the Sonata in A flat, Op. 110, of Beethoven, and Liszt's Twelve Etudes d'Execution Transcendante.

The Chamber Music Concert of Aug. 11 will also be a high light of the Festival of Contemporary American Music, Aug. 9-13; which will be sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center with the co-operation of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. At this concert the Lenox Quartet will play Elliot Carter's String Quartet No. 2; the String Quartet by Arthur Berger; Gunther Schuller's String Quartet No. 1; and the String Quartet No. 2 of Leon Kirchner.

Phyllis Curtin, soprano, assisted by Paul Ulanowsky at the piano, will be heard in the final Chamber Music Concert on Aug. 18. Her program will consist of songs by Mozant, Wolf, Berg, Richard Strauss and contemporary Latin American and American songs.

Tickets for the individual Berkshire Festival Chamber Music Concerts are available at the Festival Ticket Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, before the 15th, and at the Tanglewood Box Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, after the

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 603,438 SUN. 983,643

JUN 7 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 48,932

JUN 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,In
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-42

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,093

JUN 22 1964

Tanglewood lists Chamber concerts

A program by the New York Pro Musica will open the eight-week chamber music series June 30 at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

The remaining programs will be by violinist Joseph Silverstein and Ralph Berkowitz, July 7; the Harvard-Radcliffe choral groups, July 14; pianist Claudio Arrau, July 21; Beaux Arts Trio, July 28; pianist Jorge Bolet, Aug. 4; Lenox Quartet in contemporary music, Aug. 11, and soprano Phyllis Curtin, Aug. 18.

Tanglewood Sets Chamber Series

A series of eight Berkshire Festival chamber concerts will begin June 30 with an Elizabethan program by the New York Pro Musica.

The Tanglewood programs, slated for 8 p.m., will continue through July 7 with a violin recital by Joseph Silverstein. Assisted by pianist Ralph Berkowitz, he will play selections by Schubert, Strauss and Beethoven.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will sing works by Bach, Poulenc, Brahms and Barber July 14 and pianist Claudio Arrau will offer Mozart sonatas July 21.

On July 28, the Beaux Arts Quartet will perform compositions by Ravel, Dvorak and Mozart. Jorge Bolet will play Beethoven and Liszt etudes Aug. 4.

The Lenox Quartet will play contemporary works by Carter, Gunther Schuller and Kirchner Aug. 11 and soprano Phyllis Curtin will close out the series Aug. 18 with a program of contemporary Latin American and American songs.

Tanglewood concerts

Lenox, Mass.

The Berkshire Festival will open Tuesday, June 30, at 8 p.m. in the theater, with the first chamber music concert of the season. The New York Pro Musica will be heard at this concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concerts will take place in the Music Shed on Friday and Saturday evenings, July 3-4, and on Sunday afternoon, July 5, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. They will continue each weekend through Aug. 23.

The Tanglewood box office, which opened Monday, June 15, will continue to be open daily through Aug. 23, 9 a.m.—6 p.m. It is located at the main gate. There is a second ticket office at the south gate open on concert days at 6 p.m. before evening concerts and at noon before afternoon concerts.

All evening concerts will begin at 8 o'clock, and all afternoon concerts at 2:30 p.m. Saturday Open rehearsals will start at 10 a.m.

There is no charge for parking.

The Tanglewood grounds and the cafeteria will open at 6 p.m. on concert evenings and at noon on Sundays. Box lunches and beverages will be available as usual at the cafeteria.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923

JUN 25 1964

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304

JUN 6 1964

NY Pro Musica to Open Series at Lenox Tuesday

The New York Pro Musica will be featured in the first of a series of eight chamber music concerts at 8 p.m. Tuesday in the theater at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

THE PROGRAM will be one of Elizabethan music in honor of the 400th anniversary of the birth of Shakespeare, which is being observed this year. The ensemble of six singers and four instrumentalists will perform works by William Byrd, John Wilbye, Thomas Morley, John Dowland, Tobias Hume, Robert Jones, Robert White, Thomas Ravenscroft and Orlando Gibbons.

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced these programs for later Berkshire Festival chamber music concerts.

On July 7 Joseph Silverstein will be heard in a violin recital. He will be accompanied by Ralph Berkowitz on the piano in works by Schubert, Strauss and Beethoven.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will sing works by Schutz, Schein, Bach, Poulenc, des Prez, Brahms, Mennin, Carter and Barber July 14.

CLAUDIO ARRAU will play a piano recital of Mozart sonatas July 21.

On July 28 the Beaux Arts Trio of New York will be heard in works by Mozart, Ravel and Dvorak.

Jorge Bolet will present a piano recital Aug. 4. He will play the Sonata in A flat, Op. 110, of Beethoven and Liszt's Twelve Etudes d'Execution Transcendante.

On Aug. 11 the Lenox quartet will present a program of contemporary music.

Phyllis Curtin, soprano, will sing songs by Mozart, Wolf, Berg, Richard Strauss and contemporary Latin American and American songs Aug. 18. Paul Ulanowsky will acompany her on the piano.

Tanglewood Announces Chamber Music Schedule

The New York Pro Musica, under the direction of Noah Greenberg, will open the Festival Chamber Music series at Tanglewood July 8, according to an announcement today by director Erich Leinsdorf.

All eight programs in the series will take place on Tuesday evenings at 8 in the theater at Tanglewood.

The opening concert will honor Shakespeare's 400th birthday with an Elizabethan program.

On July 7, Joseph Silverstein, who is finishing his second season as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard in a violin recital assisted by Ralph Berkowitz at the piano. The program will consist of Schubert's Rondo Brillante, Op. 70; the Sonata in E Flat Minor by Strauss; and Beethoven's Sonata in G Major.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director, will present the chamber music concert of July 14. They will sing works by Schutz, Schein, Bach, Poulenc, des Prez, Brahms, Mennin, Carter and Barber.

Claudio Arrau will play a piano recital of Mozart sonatas on July 21, performing the Sonata in G Major, K. 283; Sonata in A Minor, K. 310; Fantaisie and Sonata in C Minor, K. 475 & 457; Sonata in B Flat, K. 570; and Sonata in D Major, K. 576.

On July 28 the Beaux Arts Trio of New York will be heard in Mozart's Trio in B Flat, K. 254; Ravel's Trio in A Minor; and the Trio in E Minor, Op. 90 ("Dumky") by Dvorak.

Jorge Bolet will present a piano recital on the program of August 4. He will play the Sonata in A Flat, Op. 110, of Beethoven, and Liszt's Twelve Etudes d'Execution Transcendante.

The Chamber Music Concert of August 11 will also be a highlight of the Festival of Contemporary American Music, August 9-13, which will be sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. At this concert the Lenox Quartet will play Elliot Carter's String Quartet No. 2; the String Quartet by Arthur Berger; Gunther Schuller's String Quartet No. 1 and the String Quartet No. 2 of Leon Kirchner.

Phyllis Curtin, soprano, assisted by Paul Ulanowsky at the piano, will be heard in the final Chamber Music Concert on August 18. Her program will consist of songs by Mozart, Wolf, Berg, Richard Strauss, and contemporary Latin American and American songs.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.

JUN 24 1964

124

Tanglewood Will Present Chamber Music Tuesday

PRO MUSICA AT TANGLEWOOD—The New York Pro Musica, under the direction of Noah Greenberg, opens the Tanglewood season at 8 p.m. Tuesday. A program of Elizabethan music is scheduled.

N. Y. Pro Musica Offers First Program of Season

The first Berkshire Festival chamber music concert at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., will be given by the New York Pro Musica at 8 p.m. Tuesday when director Noah Greenberg brings them to the festival for the fifth time. A program of Elizabethan music, in honor of the 400th anniversary of Shakespeare's birth, will be presented.

The six singers and four instruments of the ensemble will appear in solos and various groupings as compositions by William Byrd, John Wilbye, Thomas Morley, John Dowland, Tobias Hume, Robert Jones, Robert White, Thomas Ravenscroft and Orlando Gibbons are performed. Tickets for the event are on sale at the theater box office.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf's leadership, will open its section of the festival at 8 p.m. July 3 with an all-Mozart program. Soloists set for the concert are the orchestra's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, in the "Serenade in D, K. 203," and pianist Claudio Arrau, who will perform the "Piano Concerto in B-flat, K. 450."

The remainder of the show will have the "March in D" and "Symphony in C, K. 550" which is subtitled, the "Linz." Part of this year's festival will be the Musicological Symposium July 13 to 15. Six papers, including "Ornamentation in Mozart," "Problems of the Use of the Continuo in 18th Century Music," "The Sketches and Published Scores of the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony" and "The Russian Orchestral Sound", will be read by distinguished scholars in the field of musicological research. Among the 11 participants in the discussions will be Paul Henry Lang of Columbia, Donald Grout of Cornell University, and David Hughes, chairman of the department of music at Harvard.

Tickets for the symphony programs and the symposium can be obtained by writing the festival headquarters.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193

JUN 1 1964

Pro Musica Opens Festival At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Ten members of the New York Pro Musica offered a fascinating collection of weird and wonderful sounds from Elizabethan England for the first concert of the 1964 Music Festival at Tanglewood Tuesday night.

Shakespeare Tribute

It was a program to honor the 400th birthday of William Shakespeare and it was the first of eight Tuesday night chamber music and recital concerts scheduled for the 1200-seat theater on the spacious Tanglewood grounds.

The next will present Joseph Silverstein, violinist, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the first weekend of symphony concerts in the 6037-seat shed will precede it.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct an all-Mozart program Friday night at 8.

The first of the four Pro Musica organizations was founded in 1952. It was a group of six singers and four instrumentalists, and it was that group which performed here Tuesday.

There were two sopranos, a countertenor, tenor, baritone and bass. The instrumentalists used records, wood lutes, a cornet, krummhorns, a raschpfeife, viola da gamba, harpsichord and two, tiny, single manual organs, one portative and one regal.

Folk Music Air

Only three or four times during the presentation of two dozen short works from the late 16th and early 17th centuries did all of the musicians perform simultaneously.

Because much of the program was given over to vocal solos, the program gradually took on a folk music air and the audience (643), seemed to find more response for the full ensembles that opened and closed the program and the gentle, reedy instrumental ensembles in the middle.

The Pro Musica is preeminent in the field of small group Renaissance vocal ensemble music, and the combination of precision and sensitivity it brings to the intricate counterpoint of this era music is always as pleasing as it is astonishing.

This was the group's fifth appearance at Tanglewood. Let us hope it was not their last because the opportunity to hear Renaissance music performed well is rare.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

JUL 1 1964

Music Review

New York Pro Musica

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE NEW YORK Pro Musica provided the first program of the Tanglewood season last night in the Theater-Concert Hall. For the first of a series of eight concerts designated as chamber music, Noah Greenberg, the ensemble's musical director, chose a program of Elizabethan music honoring the 400th birthday of William Shakespeare.

There could not have been a happier choice of selections nor a more congruent grouping. Byrd, Morley and Dowland were the most ample sources of the evening, with names such as Wilbye, Hume, Robert Jones, Robert White, Ravenscroft and Orlando Gibbons appearing for single entries.

* * *

SIX DIVISIONS of the program were divided into groups employing all the six voices and four instrumentalists, and all possible subdivisions of that ensemble. So far as possible instruments of the period without changes or improvements of a later date were used, and it did not take a too lively imagination to visualize the artists of the evening in habits appropriate to ladies and gentlemen of the Elizabethan era.

The program moved with spirit and zest. Greenberg's performers have changed to some extent over the many years he has been appearing in this vicinity, but he has never had a more capable consort than the one which gave the audience such high pleasure, in the solos, the duets, or the various uses of voices and instruments.

* * *

THE INSTRUMENTS of last night are now almost entirely abandoned for replacements of greater range or expressiveness. What the composers of that day wrote for them, however, cannot be expressed half so well by their current versions, and so the old type recorders and flutes played by LaNoue Davenport and Shelley Gruskin, the viola da gamba by Judith Davidoff, and the keyboards, harpsichord or organ by Edward Smith gave a true and authentic character and sound to the music on which the program concentrated.

But the music for voices has not been superseded by any means. Greenberg has a team of first rate vocalists, two sopranos, Sheila Schonbrun and Elizabeth Humes, and four male voices, Earnest Murphy, countertenor, Ray DeVoll, tenor, Arthur Burrows, baritone, and Brayton Lewis, bass. The polyphonic music written for voices unaccompanied was both of the most engaging of the evening and conspicuously well done. Their "Lamentations of Jeremiah" of White was a purely delightful effort, and in much the same type were Dowland's "Weep You No More" sung by Miss Schonbrun and an anonymous "The Willow Song" by Miss Humes, all of which gave infinite pleasure.

* * *

BUT IT MUST not be supposed that the evening was totally morose. The contrary spirit obtained for most of the program and gaiety and rowdiness, even, were expressed in plenty of the choices. Scholars may know just how much contact Shakespeare had with musicians of the day, but at least one link exists with one of last night's composers, for Robert Jones, whose "Dreams and Imaginations" countertenor Murphy sang, is the source of a song in "Twelfth Night" and is one of the bench marks by which the play is placed in time.

And it would not be right to ignore the historical connotation in Tobias Hume's hilarious "Tobacco Is Like Love" sung by baritone Burrows when the memory of the name of the British explorer and gallant Sir Walter Raleigh is inescapably invoked. The hearty applause was acknowledged partially by the addition to the program of another gay Morley song for the ensemble, "About the Maypole."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240

JUL 1 1964

Music Review

New York Pro Musica Opens Tanglewood Season

THE NEW YORK PRO MUSICA at the Theater Concert Hall, Tanglewood, Lenox, in a program of Elizabethan music celebrating the 400th birthday of William Shakespeare. Noah Greenberg, musical director.

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

The first concert of Tanglewood's eight-week season that opened last night in a performance at the Theater Concert Hall seemed designed for hot weather contrast. Light, coquettish and pleasant, it sounded only the gentlest thoughts for the furrowed mind. Enhanced by the lush green setting of Tanglewood's grounds that know no drought and in sweete concerte with the evening birds, the Elizabethan program honored the 400th birthday of Shakespeare in fine style.

New Names

With the many names that were familiar to those who heard Noah Greenberg's brilliant 1962 Tanglewood performance were added some new that arrested more than passing attention. However, only Edward Smith who most sensitively performed on harpsichord, portative organ and regal, was new among the instrumentalists. But soprano Elizabeth Humes, whose delicate singing of "The poor soul sat sighing" and Ray De Voll's well controlled tenor voice, were outstanding. Arthur Burrows' amusing performance of "Tobacco is like love" by Tobias Hume would have perhaps amused a bit more if diction had been clearer.

This might well have been a general criticism of much of the evening. Songs rely to some extent on meaning of text, but they also rely for persuasion on the basic accuracy of the sounded word. Hence, occasionally last night, musical design seemed slurred as a result.

There is made, perhaps, in Elizabethan music more than a conscious effort by the modern ear to cope with the careful descending resolution in stepwise progression of each musical figure. This seemingly naive approach to music, plus the model sounds without deliberate lightness of voice tends to cloy and wear faster than it should. But the concert proved once more that for sheer enjoyment, works by such men as Morley, Byrd, Dowland, Gibbons and Ravenscroft are still unmatched today.

New Trend

The Chamber Concerts seem this year to steer a little aside from the usual string quartet genre of performance.

Pianists Claudio Arrau and Jorge Bolet will play on the fourth and sixth weeks respectively. Soprano Phyllis Curtin will perform in the eighth week and the Harvard Radcliffe Choruses will perform on the third of the Tuesday night Chamber Series. This leaves but two evenings for the Beaux Arts Trio and Lenox String Quartet. There is one more by Joseph Silverstein, violinist and Ralph Berkowitz, pianist. These artists will be heard next Tuesday in a program of Schubert, Beethoven and Strauss.

The Knickerbocker News · Albany, Wed., July 1, 1964

Pro Musica Group Brilliant in Variety Program at Tanglewood

By DANIEL L. CUSICK

If the lovely evening were not enough to enchant the music lovers at Tanglewood last night, the final touch was put on by the superb playing of the Pro Musica of New York. The combination of the elements, night and music, was sufficient to cure even the worst case of heat annoyance.

With Noah Greenberg at the helm, the Pro Musica ensemble offered a program of Elizabethan music "Honoring the 400th birthday of William Shakespeare."

The performing of works by Shakespeare's contemporaries was at once virile and elegant, in the style of the writing itself.

PRO MUSICA REAL "PROS" — The Pro Musica of New York, lead by Noah Greenberg (left) proved to be musicians of superb talents during their concert at Tanglewood last night with a program of Elizabethan compositions.

OPENING with the strong-sinewed "This Sweet and Merry Month," of William Byrd, the musicians displayed admirable restraint with works that easily could have carried them into the realm of overemotional performance.

The 10-unit group, which included three women, played with a finely cultured sound, blending their individual talents for the benefit of the whole. But there was never doubt that each of the persons on the stage was of soloist capability.

The individual singers and instrumentalists were given their own spots during one section of the performance. When each had finished his stint, he left the stage in the manner of the Haydn "Farewell Symphony."

★ ★ ★

THE FADEAWAY began with Thomas Morley's "La Caccia" as a duet between LaNoue Davenport on recorder and Shelley Gruskin on flute. The difficult, but playful, tune was thrown back and forth from one instrument to the other in an ever-increasing accumulation of technical display. So well did the men do their bit that they finished the composition and left the stage, to much applause, in a dead draw as to who was the better of the two.

It was then Sheila Schonbrun's turn to sing with harpsichord and Viola da gamba accompaniment. Dowland's "Weep No More" received a clear and sensitive rendering by the vocalist. Judith Davidoff, the viola da gamba soloist, chose Hume's "Captain Hume's Galliard" as the number in which she would show her virtuosity. Her unwieldy instrument was made to respond with a tone of beauty and depth. No piece of technique was beyond Miss Davidoff's ken as she manipulated the work with a minimum of effort.

Harpsichordist Edward Smith, usually relegated to an accompanists role in the ensemble, was alone on the stage as he played William Byrd's "Barley-Break," which could have been called, as easily, "Finger-Breaker." Appearing to be almost one with the instrument, Mr. Smith whirled through the piece, fast runs and all, with the aplomb of one who has been at this kind of thing for years. His was a remarkable performance.

★ ★ ★

THE COMPOSITION, itself, is worth special comment for it well may be the first tone poem ever devised. Tongue-in-cheek allusions to rustic songs and dances were made and, at a few points, the instrument was made to give forth boistrous laughter with its playing patterns.

When Mr. Smith left the stage, the full ensemble returned for one last fine presentation before the intermission. Robert White's "Lamentations of Jeremiah" employed the full forces of the Pro Musica to best advantage, again showing the beautiful homogeneous sound that the group reaches under Mr. Greenberg's direction.

The second half of the program was distinguished by some brilliant soloing in a lighter vein.

★ ★ ★

RAY DE VOLL, a tenor possessed of a wonderfully clear, cool declamatory style, sang Morley's "Thyrsis and Milla" in a way that was a delight to the ears. Mr. DeVoll's facility in the rapid passages, like that of the duet which he sang with soprano Sheila Schonbrun, is almost too easy for him. Rarely is the lucidity of tone matched with such a technique in the same singer.

Baritone Arthur Burrows set forth with Tobias Hume's "Tobacco Is Like Love," a tune which is as timely today as it was 400 years ago. Enumerating the similarities in a most illogical way, the singer drew a delighted burst of handclaps from his listeners.

As a capping-off number, Mr. Greenberg had the full ensemble onstage again for Orlando Gibbon's "London Street Cries." Gibbons has conjured up a picture of one day in the life of an English town of the 16th Century simply by putting music to calls of fish hawkers and chimney sweeps. The effect is like a scene from "La Boheme," and just as picturesque and dramatic in its naturalness. Variety was the keynote of the show and, for a summer evening's entertainment, it was just the ticket.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-2230

WORCESTER, MASS.
Gazette
Eve. Circ. 92,729

JUL 1 1964

Pro Musica Opens Season At Tanglewood

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Berkshire Festival opened last night at Tanglewood in the Theater - Concert Hall with the first of eight concerts of Chamber music. The New York Pro Musica, Noah Greenberg, director, presented six singers and four instrumentalists in an Elizabethan concert honoring the 400th birthday of William Shakespeare.

Successive Tuesdays up to Aug. 18 will feature Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Ralph Berkowitz, piano, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director; Claudio Arrau, piano, the Beaux Arts Trio of New York, Jorge

Gazette Review

Bolet, piano, the Lenox String Quartet and Phyllis Curtin, soprano. For this series, the 1,200 seat hall is augmented by listeners who sit on the lawn.

Boston Symphony

July 3 to 12 brings two weekends of concerts in the 6,000 seat Music Shed by 50 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in music of Mozart, Haydn, Schubert and Richard Strauss. July 17 begins six weekends of concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last night's program included the English composers Byrd, Wilbye, Morley, Dowland, Hume, Jones, White, Ravenscroft and Gibbons. Some of the music was for voices alone, some for instruments only, but most of it for voices with quaint soft accompaniment.

Busiest players were Judith Davidoff, on the viola da gamba, and Edward Smith, playing harpsichord, portative organ and the regal, another small organ. LaNoue Davenport played various sizes of recorders, the curved krummhorn and a contrabass krummhorn, a wooden instrument not to be confused with the common krummhorn and shrill little rauschpfeife.

Effective Soprano

Sheila Schonbrun, soprano, was effective in Dowland's "Weep You No More" and in Ray DeVoll, tenor, in Morley's "It Was a Lover and His Lass." Earnest Murphy, countertenor, was greatly admired in Jones' "Dreams and Imaginations." Arthur Burrows, baritone made the audience laugh in Hume's "Tobacco is Like Love." Elizabeth Humes, soprano, and Brayton Lewis, bass, also soloed and ensembled.

The evening's norm was light well - projected song in good balance. The most unique text was the finale, Gibbon's "London Street Cries."

Sunday Tel
WORCESTER
Circ. 102

JUN 28 19

Music Festiv

By RAYMOND
Telegram Mus

William Shakes birthday will be opening of the Ber festival's chamber s at Tanglewood.
The Noah Greenberg's perform an Eliza ram of works by owland, Morley,
d Jones. The e singers and four instrumentalists in an Elizabethan concert honoring the 400th birthday of William Shakespeare.

Successive Tuesdays up to Aug. 18 will feature Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Ralph Berkowitz, piano, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director; Claudio Arrau, piano, the Beaux Arts Trio of New York, Jorge

Balance of the series ranges from Barber, Boston Symphony Master, Joseph Silverstein, Ralph Berkowitz, Elliot Forbes, Claudio Arrau, Schubert, Beethoven program on

Mozart Soci

Elliot Forbes will Harvard Glee Cl
liffe Choral Soc
Mozart sonatas
ormed by the Cr
Claudio Arrau, Ju
On July 28 the Trio of New York
a Mozart-Ravel
ram. Cuban pian et will play Beeth
n A flat, Opus 11

Sprout
Prepar

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,435
JUL 26 1964

Music

Festival to Note Bard's Birthday

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

William Shakespeare's 400th birthday will be noted at the opening of the Berkshire Music Festival's chamber music series at Tanglewood.

The New York Pro Musica, Noah Greenberg, director, will perform an Elizabethan program of works by Byrd, Wilbye, Dowland, Morley, Hume, White and Jones. The ensemble consists of six singers and four instrumentalists.

Balance of the eight-concert series ranges from Bach to [illegible].

Boston Symphony concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, and Ralph Berkowitz, pianist, will play a Schubert-Strauss-Beethoven program on July 7.

Mozart Sonatas

Elliot Forbes will conduct the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society July 14. Mozart sonatas will be performed by the Chilean pianist, Claudio Arrau, July 21.

On July 28 the Beaux Arts Trio of New York will be heard in a Mozart-Ravel-Dvorak program. Cuban pianist Jorge Bolet will play Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, Opus 110, and Liszt's twelve Etudesd 'Execution Transcendante, Aug. 4. The latter are rarely heard in their entirety.

A program of contemporary music will be offeed by the Denox Quartet on Aug. 11. Without doubt there will be strong pro-and-con reactions to works by Elliot Carter, Arthur Berger, Gunther Schulle and Leon Kichner.

Soprano Phyllis Curtin, assisted by Paul Ulanowsky at the piano, will complete the series, Aug. 18.

All programs begin at 8:00 p.m.. Tickets may be obtained at the Tanglewood box office, Lenox.

Parents Warned

If you're suffering from an inferiority complex, the probable reason is explained in the July issue of McCall's Magzine.

Musicologist Abram Chasins warns parents that "a child who does not learn to enjoy music is headed for an inferiority complex."

Chasins urgently recommends that mothers automatically hum to their babies, play the radio or phonograph, and stop in the middle of a chore to dance.

"Precept, not preachment, is what works," says Chasins. "I know of no more effective way to dampen a child's enthusiasm and curiosity about music than to sit him in front of a machine with the announcement that he should appreciate what comes out of it. If he starts to amble out of the room, don't make him stay. He will return again another day."

When should a child begin taking lessons on an instrument?

Chasins has the answer to this, too. "The piano, recorder, percussion and string instruments can be studied as soon as a child is emotionally and intellectually ready to undergo the physical and mental training involved. When is that? When he asks for lessons, and asks hard."

A teacher was explaining to her pupil the requirements for participating in the program of the National Guild of Piano Teachers. She then asked if he understood it clearly.

"I think I understand everything," he said, "except that Irresponsible Misunderstanding Test."

It will be a long time, however, before anyone tops "augminished and demented" chords.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711
JUL 4 1964

Sonata Recital

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will give a concert with pianist Ralph Berkowitz Tuesday evening at 8 in the Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER
CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK
STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY UNION STAR
Monday, July 6, 1964

Silverstein to Give Tanglewood Concert

This week's programs at the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will open with a chamber music concert tomorrow at 8 p.m. by violinist Joseph Silverstein with Ralph Berkowitz at the piano. They will present Schubert's "Rondo Brilliante, Op. 70"; Richard Strauss' "Sonata in E Flat Major"; and Beethoven's "Sonata in G Major." The Tuesday night concerts are for the benefit of the scholarship fund.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JUL 8 1964

Strauss Played At Tanglewood By Silverstein

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The sweet, silky tone Joseph Silverstein normally draws from his violin was admirably suited to the music he scheduled for his recital Tuesday night in the theater at Tanglewood.

Second in Series

Silverstein is the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his recital was the second concert of the chamber music series presented by the Berkshire Music Festival.

It fell to him to offer the first 6 works by Richard Strauss scheduled for performance during this year's festival in honor of the 100th anniversary of Strauss' birth.

He chose the Violin Sonata in E flat, Op. 18, a work of Strauss' youth and one which showed qualities similar to the Schubert Rondo Brillante, Op. 70, with which Silverstein opened the recital.

Beethoven, Schubert

And the Beethoven Violin Sonata in G major, Op. 96, with which he closed the program, was overladen with niceness.

But even though the three works as well as the approach to each was similar, there were, of course, differences.

The Schubert, for instance, gave the pianist opportunities (not always taken) to swap positions with the violinist and present lively little melodies accompanied by double-stopped chords on the fiddle.

Talent for Sentiment

The Strauss (especially the middle movement) offered Silverstein the opportunity to exploit to the fullest his talent for romantic sentiment —a talent belied by his cool facial expression and quiet manner.

And the Strauss, also offered just about the only chance for the pianist (Ralph Berkowitz) to bang out some strong, gutty, percussive chords. They came during the final few measures.

The Beethoven which followed intermission was not as saccharine as the Strauss.

Hear Balmy Music

The emotion was less sentimental; the second movement adagio was lovely and lyrical; the third movement scherzo was lively, even frisky; and the fourth movement showed just a hint of the muscle that is always available in Beethoven's work.

There were 725 listeners in the theater. They heard a program of balmy music on one of the most balmy evenings in Lenox this season.

Sp. Union 7/6/64

Prepare for Concert Tuesday

Joseph Silverstein, right, who is completing his second year as concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, confers with Ralph Berkowitz, pianist, in preparation for their Berkshire Festival chamber music concert Tuesday night at 8 in the Tanglewood Theater. The program will consist of Schubert's Rondo Brillante, Opus 70; Strauss' Sonata in E-flat minor; and Beethoven's Sonata in G major.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JUL 8 1964

Music Review

An Evening of 19th-Century Sonatas

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

AN EVENING of 19th century sonatas for violin and piano, played by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Ralph Berkowitz, made up the program last night in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood as the second concert of the chamber music series.

The Richard Strauss sonata dates from 1887, only 60 years later than the B Minor Rondo Brillante of Schubert, yet they are centuries apart. There are several marvels in Strauss' score. That he would write with such deftness for the keyboard was expected, but that he should turn phrases so demanding yet so natural for a fingerboard was quite amazing.

* * *

SILVERSTEIN and Berkowitz are extremely able artists, but the piano was made to express the full potential within the dynamic limits of the instrument while the violin was utilized to sound only a much narrower gamut. There are passages in the first movement which seem to just plead for a heroic bravado, but the violin's appassionato was not sufficiently molto, as indicated. Silverstein produces a tone of unsurpassed silken and tenuous warmth, but its effect might be accentuated if it were abandoned for an instant for contrasts of burly virility.

The central movement is called "Improvisation," and it is ethereally beautiful. It lies in a lovely register and both instruments sang with poignant appeal. The central section of this movement is the part to which the title really applies. The piano has a graceful and air-light, little motif whose embellishments are answered by a muted violin, much in the nature of the "Vogel als Prophete."

* * *

THE FIRST note of Beethoven's last violin and piano sonata, G Major, Opus 96, has been scrutinized under a musicologist's loupe more than any other single note in musical literature. Last night it was played starting on the written note and without a turn. It is agreed that trills which begin a phrase should lack the usual upper note, but there is greater weight to the contention that they should end in a turn though none is written.

The sudden and abrupt "pianos" which are typical of Beethoven were not consistently clearly realized and the second theme jump was made to sound more like a children's hop and skip rather than a Tallchief leap which would have been more appropriate in our ears.

* * *

BERKOWITZ gave the adagio a singing sonority without attempting to adorn one of the most touching themes Beethoven ever wrote. It ranks with the slow movements of some of the great piano sonatas. Silverstein's bow is endless in this nature of movement. He can sustain tone long after one's breath has been exhausted. We cannot agree that the brief cadenza benefits from being deprived of any shape or color. His bow served him again in the trio of the scherzo with uncanny reserves.

Berkowitz gave the final allegretto a jolly lilt. This movement gives intimations of the late quartets with its insertions of contrasting tempos and moods. The return to G major is disturbed by a short adagio and later an equally short fugato in G minor. The audience gave the artists many recalls and intensely enthusiastic applause.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUL 8 1964

Music Review

Violin and Piano Works Presented At Tanglewood

lin and RALPH BERKOWITZ, piano, at Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood, last night.

Rondo brillante Schubert
Violin Sonata in E flat Strauss
Violin Sonata in G minor, Op. 96 Beethoven

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

Skill was the prime requisite of last night's concert of violin and piano works played by two faculty members of the Berkshire Music Center. The infrequently heard Schubert Rondo and the flamboyant Strauss Sonata demand virtuosi skill.

There is little that Mr. Silverstein missed in this performance to produce the full effects of his considerable talent. His tone, though as always small in contrast to some other famous solosit violinists, is immensely sweet and perfect. So is his intricate, cool handling of the music's twists and turns. However, cool might not be too strong a word for his interpretation. There were moments in those two works when one felt he could not but pause or lean more heavily into the music or perhaps yield in some way to the music's innate persuasion.

The two works are not, to this reviewer's mind, excellent examples of violin-piano work, but they present opportunity, especially the Strauss, to broaden the lines and develop more personally the ideas.

Strauss Work

The Strauss work almost bursts its duet limitations in sounding like an orchestra. One senses, horns, tympani and also the youthful enthusiasm of the romanticist. It calls upon the pianist to pull all stops and lend himself quite equally to the challenge. Mr. Berkowitz did pull all stops, but at times it seemed he took less care in doing so. There was a harshness and uneven technique that one seldom associates with this fine accompanist.

Keyboard and a string instrument often produce a peculiarly vague sense of discomfit to some listeners. Likely this is a result of the fixed (tempered) pitch of the piano against the variable (truer) pitch of the strings. There are, of course, many natural adjustments made by the violinist to cope with the piano's "given" pitch. But when both are filling the air with sound, the free-wheeling dealing ability of a confident violin to scale and leap precisely as it may, makes one feel a need for the fixed or variable pitch, but not both at once. The phenomenon may have limited to some extent the literature of much such duet music. At any rate, there seemed in these two works, perhaps due to Mr. Silverstein's preeminence as a violinist, more peculiarity in sound than one might call balanced contrast.

The Beethoven Sonata which completed this program was also Beethoven's last. Its movements are vigorous, expressive, playful, peaceful and devoid of the fussy ferment found in the earlier Strauss and Schubert works. The adagio, typically Beethoven, shared with the easy mood of the finale, the highest point of the evening.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JUL 8 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUL 8 1964

Tanglewood Student Concert Tomorrow

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will give its first concert of the season tomorrow evening at 8 in the theater at Tanglewood. This concert will be one of over 40 events open to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center this season.

Richard Burgin, head of the Music Center's department of instrumental music, will conduct the concert. The program will be Haydn's Symphony No. 95 in C minor, Hindemith's Symphonia Serena, and Mussorgsky-Ravel's Pictures at an Exhibition.

The Friends of the Berkshire Music Center are those who make voluntary contributions for the support of the activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music. Contributions may be made in person at the Friends office at the main gate of Tanglewood or by mail to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912
JUL 9 1964

For Friends

Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, those who make a voluntary contribution to the support of the center, are invited to five regular events in the coming week.

Members of the Music Center will be heard in chamber music programs in the Chamber Music Hall on Monday at 8 p.m., Thursday at 8 p.m., and Sunday, July 19, at 8 p.m.

The first Composers Forum of the season will take place in the Chamber Music Hall, Wednesday at 8 p.m. July 19 at 10 a.m. the Friends of the Music Center will have an opportunity to hear the third program in the series of "Music of J. S. Bach," a special enterprise of the Music Center which is being presented for the first time this season.

All the Bach programs on Sunday mornings will take place in the Theatre.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JUL 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bee
NEWTOWN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,248
JUL 17 1964

Tanglewood 'Friends' Aid Young Musicians

LENOX—The veteran Tanglewood visitor knows that, ever since 1946, the "Friends Events" have been programs presented by the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center, and they are open only to those who have become Friends of the Berkshire Music Center by making a voluntary contribution to the support of the center.

Chamber Work Emphasized

With thhe advent of Erich Leinsdorf as director of the center, a sharp emphasis has been placed on chamber music, both vocal and instrumental. Mr. Leinsdorf believes that whether a young musician intends to be a soloist or an ensemble performer, it is chamber music which makes the greatest demands on his technique, style, and general musicianship. This year there are fewer orchestra and chorus concerts and more chamber music programs, in order to give everyone a chance to try his mettle in public. These programs alone, which will feature not only string but also woodwind and brass ensembles, are an opportunity to hear much music by the masters which is hard to find in the everyday concert world.

There are other innovations this year. On Sunday mornings at 10 a. m. there is a series of The Music of J. S. Bach in the Theater, which includes both his vocal and instrumental works. From July 13-15 there will be a much - discussed Musicological Symposium, at which there will be lectures and discussions by eleven leading musicologists on 18th and 19th Century performace problems and techniques. From Aug. 9 to 13 there will be a festival within a festival, with the Festival of Contemporary American Music, sponsored in association with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. During this five-day period there will be panel discussions with the ten young composers who have been commissioned to write works for this Festival, and performances of their works and others by the Fromm Fellows the Tanglewood Choir and the Lenox Quartet (the Lenox Quartet program will not be a Friends Event but one of the Tuesday Evening Chamber Music Concerts). In the following week, on Aug. 17, there will be a String Symposium in two sessions, which will continue the discussions begun last summer on the problems involved in the teaching of stringed instruments and ways to overcome the current shortage of string players.

Last year contributors to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center numbered 4183 and total contributions came to $30,967. These funds are used directly for the educational work of the Music Center, including the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund. The Scholarship Fund is a vital arm of the Music Center. Of the 250 talented young musicians enrolled this season, over sixty per eent have received full tuition grants for the eight-week session, and of these a large number have also been provided with board and dormitory accommodations.

In speaking of his aims for the Music Center this spring, Erich Leinsdorf said: "Our standards of admission will be stricter. Thus the accomplished string or wind player will be assured that he will encounter only his equals in chamber music groups. Our conducting enrollment will be by invitation only. The vocal department has been enlarged and a special emphasis placed on the music of Bach. Our program for composers will be as wide and inclusive as possible."

wEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
: 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Republican (m)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 24,059
JUL 16 1964

CLAUDIO ARRAU, pianist, will present a Mozart sonata recital at the Berkshire Festival's Chamber Music Concert next Tuesday at 8: p. m. in the Tanglewood Theatre, Lenox, Mass.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUL 18 1964

Friends Events Are Scheduled At Tanglewood

The Berkshire Music School will present five student concerts for Friends of the Music Center at Tanglewood the week of July 20.

The Tanglewood choir, under the direction of faculty and student conductors, will give its first concert of the season Monday. Erich Leinsdorf will direct the Music Center Orchestra in a Thursday evening program including works by Mozart, Strauss, Schuller and Stravinsky's ballet music for "Pulcinella." The Music Center's vocal department will provide soloists for the Stravinsky work.

Chamber music will be heard this week at 3:30 p.m. on Friday and at 8 p.m. on Sunday. The fourth "Music of J. S. Bach" event will take place on Sunday at 10 a.m. in the Tanglewood Theater.

These concerts are open to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. The Friends are those who contribute to the center's scholarship fund. Contributions can be made at the gate.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JUL 15 1964

Composer Forum Concert Tonight At Tanglewood

A concert of contemporary music, composed by members of the Berkshire Music Center, will be performed by the Fromm Music Foundation Players tonight at 8 in the Chamber Music Hall at Tanglewood. This event will be open to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Tonight's program will include works by William Albright, a student at the University of Michigan from West Orange, N.J.; Richard Grayson, a University of Chicago graduate from Los Angeles, Calif.; Alfred Lerdahl, a student at Sweet Briar College from Madison, Wis.; Thorkell Sigurbjornsson, a composer from Reykjavik, Iceland; William Valente, a Harvard graduate and Ford Foundation Resident Composer from Tulsa, Okla.; and Don Wilson, a Cornell graduate from Ithaca, N.Y.

The Friends of the Berkshire Music Center are those who make voluntary contributions for the support of the activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music. Contributions may be made in person at the Friends Office at the Main Gate of Tanglewood or by mail to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUL 28 1964

Music Review

Pianist Arrau Plays Mozart At Tanglewood

Fourth concert of the Chamber Music Series, Tanglewood Theater, with pianist Claudio Arrau performing a group of Mozart sonatas;

Sonta in G major, K283
Sonata in A minor, K 310
Fantasy in C minor, K 475
Sonata in C minor, K 457
Sonata in E flat major, K 570
Sonata in D major, K 576

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

Last night's concert despite the currently wilting weather, boasted the largest audience of the season thus far for the regular Tuesday night Chamber Concerts. The almost full moon and gentle breeze on the lawn outside the Theater added mood to the listening mind and the trilling song of a Mozartian thrush just before darkness fell, created during an andante, the finest backdrop one could ask for.

Chilly Academic Study

Without such props the program might have been called a chilly academic study. It covered a chronological list of works that showed the development of the form with Mozart and generally the developing importance of the pianoforte. The pianoforte came into being during Mozart's short span of life to become predominant over other keyed instruments of the day. The harpsichord, spinet, clavichord, cembalo, claricembalo, gravecrembalo, claverl are a few of the many confusing names given to the competing keyboard instruments of the late seventeen hundreds. There was reason for some competition since a clavichord in the hands of a professional has considerable flexibility in phrasing, some tone control within a limited range of dynamics and it can sustain tone of singing quality. Today's grand piano with its steel harp and heavier sounding board sings a melody only with difficulty, but particular notes do not need emphasizing with the turns, trills and other embellishments as with harpsichord. Hence, as the program proceeded, there appeared more flowing melodic line, and adagios became more sustained and more similar to Beethoven's masterful piano work.

Mr. Arrau's tone became less dry as the program progressed and more pianistic as we familiarly know the piano to be. Phrase endings were sustained longer also. However, it might be added that Mozart wrote for piano not harpsichord, even though he played the instrument most of his life and one would have expected Mr. Arrau's tone to become even juicier than it finally became.

As usual the program noted which piano the performer played, Mr. Arraup plays the Baldwin. Mr. Mozart played a Stein in 1777 and noted that the maker guaranteed the sounding board would neither break nor split. The maker's secret, by the way was to expose the board to rain, snow and heat, that when it cracked he could insert wedges and glue it to make it firm and therefore be assured that there would be no such trouble in the future.

Agreeable to Ear

The program seemed long, there were not many cuts of repeats. The elegance and melody seems after long listening a little lavish, however, one is never worn by strong emotion that might be found in such as Beethoven's andantes or allegros. Mozart tries first to be agreeable to the ear and if one listens not too long to such pianoforte speech, the music is pellucidly clear. Yet, after three or four sonatas there creeps into the contemporary ear a sound that might seem falsely ornamental and the feeling will not leave one until he remembers there is a gap of about 200 years.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193
JUL 22 1964

Claudio Arrau Gives Concert At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Claudio Arrau is one pianist, at least, who considers the piano sonatas of Mozart a serious matter.

Emotional Depth

He played five of them and a Mozart piano fantasy in the theater at Tanglewood Tuesday night with an emotional depth some listeners think is not in the music.

Only once or twice in the first movement of the first piece, Sonata in G major, K283, and perhaps the first movement of the B Flat Sonata, K.570, did the music take on some of the powdered tinkly sound supposedly characteristic of the 18th century drawing room.

Arrau's performance seemed to acquire more and more emotion and accuracy as the program progressed.

Increase in Intensity

He followed the G major sonata, K.283 with the A minor, K.310, and seemed to increase the intensity of the sound from movement to movement. A slight fingering inaccuracy here and there among the delicate decorations had no effect on the atmosphere of elegance.

He was able to move freely and securely among the seemingly infinite shades of emphasis, volume and speed at his command without entering the area of extreme volumes and speeds forbidden to a performer of Mozart's keyboard music. The long fantasy in C minor, K.476, which traditionally leads directly into the first movement of the C minor sonata, K.456, because Mozart played and published it that way, is full of pitfalls for the unwary pianist who has a tendency to overdramatize.

Although Arrau may be accused benevolently of applying a fair amount of personal mannerism to the fantasy it can be said that he proudly escaped the pitfalls, drew smoothly a flowing and lyrical music from the melodic sections and electrified the air with power and drama in the contrasting sections.

Longer Than Usual

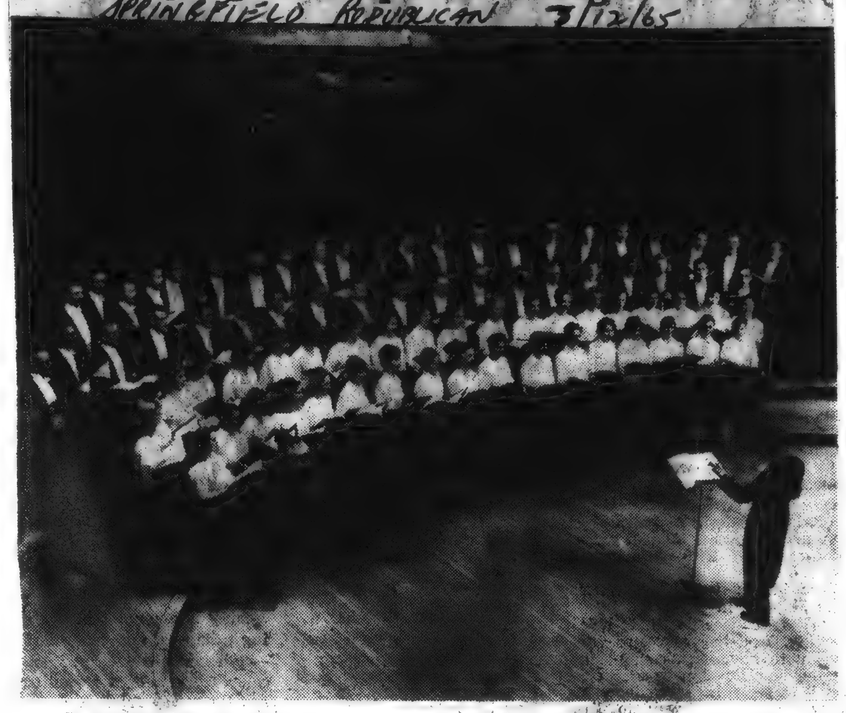
The program which ran perhaps 20 minutes longer than usual, ended with the B flat sonata, K.570, and D major sonata, K.576.

And in those as well as in the earlier sections of the program Arrau seemed to be at home with all facets of Mozart's style while being most assured and expressive in the slow movements.

He played the slow adagio's in each sonata with great beauty when the melodic line was lyrical and with great intensity when it was emotional. The moments which didn't reach the highest of standards were rare.

Singing Groups at Tanglewood

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN 3/12/65



The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director, will present a chamber music concert Tuesday evening at 8 in the Tanglewood Theater. They will perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, conducting, next Saturday night at 8 in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. The program will be Wagner's Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser;" Strauss' "Die Tageszeiten," Op. 76; Debussy's "Three Nocturnes;" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," Op. 28.

Music Review

Choral Concert

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE THIRD program in the Tanglewood chamber music series last night enlisted an 80-voice chorus supplied equally by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Their superb training showed in the initial groups they sang under the leadership of Elliott Forbes, their conductor. This was a half dozen choruses, in which a work by Johann Sebastian Bach was the most recent. The Magnificat ("Meine Seele erhebt den, erren") of Heinrich Schuetz began with a majestic punch delivered with full, vibrant force. Then, in the ensuing "Die mit Traenen saen" of Johann Hermann Schein, the chorus showed its ability to maintain lines with clarity without explosive bursts.

* * *

THE BACH Motet No. 5 "Komm, Jesu, Komm," opens with four detached strong pleas: "Komm," in which the attacks and releases came out cleaner than hounds' teeth.

The whole program was sung without accompaniment except for the "Litanies a la Vierge Noire" (Notre Dame de Roc-Amadour) of Francis Poulenc in which a huge, portable tracker organ, constructed by Noack of Andover, was used to supply fascinating, harsh discords.

* * *

FIVE SONGS of Johannes Brahms, Opus 104, were of delightfully less vigorous impact. "Verlorene Jugend" and "In Herbst" glow with a tender sadness, and the two "Night Watch" songs vie amiably with nostalgia for Rembrandt's inspiration. The second "Night Watch" was sung at Brahms' own funeral and all accounts speak of the effect of the poignancy of one watchman's voice, answering "They rest" to the solemn question, "Rest they?"

* * *

THE FINAL half of the program was entirely contemporary American: Peter Mennin, represented by two lovely songs for women's voices only: "Tumbling Hair" and "Bought Locks"; Elliott Carter's heroic "The Defense of Corinth" for men's voices, but in which there is a narrator, a solo quartet and a piano played four hands; and, finally, Samuel Barber's "Reincarnations" on three poems of James Stephen (after the Irish of Raftery) for the combined voices.

Rarely has a single program been devised to show such variety and contrast and to exhibit the disciplined potentialities of the fresh, strong voices. From the thundering opening Magnificat to the closing homely, lyric verses it was an evening of fine music-making.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2073, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193
JUL 15 1964

College Groups Give Concert At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—It may be that the 86 members of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society saved their best stuff for Tanglewood Tuesday night.

It is possible, however, that all 34 works they sang during the month-long concert tour they are just finishing were performed just as impressively as the 15 they chose to present to the 934 listeners in the Theater Tuesday.

The program included music from nearly every musical period from the 15th Century to the present, and the singers seemed to gain strength and tonal accuracy as the program progressed.

First were three baroque works, most impressive perhaps being Bach's Motet No. 5, "Komm, Jesu, Komm," a double-chorus which was kept from a tendency toward heaviness by agile dynamics and middle to low volumes.

Five songs by Brahms also were notable for attention to delicacy of nuance and accents as well as the full, warm tones appropriate to Brahms.

Most impressive were Elliott Carter's "Defense of Corinth" by the glee club and Poulenc's "Litanies a la Vierge Noire" by the choral society.

The Poulenc, accompanied by the small tracker-action Nowak pipe organ, was laden with a sense of tragedy brought about by sometimes stark, almost pagan, harmonies and sometimes gentle dissonances.

The Carter was a highly dramatic setting of a comic story by Rabelais involving singing, talking and shouting in highly propulsive rhythmic patterns and frequently very dense textures.

It received a strong response from the audience. The contemporary "Reincarnations" by Samuel Barber, which followed it and is in many ways a more substantial work, seemed somewhat anticlimactic.

The two groups will perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Shed Saturday night in works by Wagner, Strauss and Debussy and will wind up their tour Sunday with a concert on Cape Cod.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711

JUL 24 1964

Berkshire Music

Center Orchestra In Exciting Program

By MICHAEL STEINBERG Globe Music Critic

LENOX — Thursday night, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra gave the second concert of its season, conducted this time by Erich Leinsdorf. These concerts are eminently worth going to for a number of reasons. First of all, the programs themselves are apt to be much more interesting than those of the Boston Symphony Concerts. Then, it is exciting, and often moving, to hear the work of the extraordinarily talented youngsters who spend their Summer at Tanglewood. Not least, it is fascinating to watch the work of a conductor like Leinsdorf with an orchestra that is not only not his own, but that is quite unlike his own in age, experience, and attitude.

Much of the credit for the success of these concerts goes to the assistants who do the preliminary rehearsing. On this occasion, two of Leinsdorf's four conducting students were involved: Eduardo Mata and Larry Newland, and Leinsdorf expressed his appreciation to both in a little speech and then brought them out for bows at the end of the evening.

The program was one to tax any orchestra: Mozart's Haffner Symphony, two interludes from "Intermezzo" by Richard Strauss, Gunther Schuller's "Symphonic Study," and the complete "Pulcinella" score of Stravinsky.

The orchestra, taxed further by having to switch during the course of the evening across an enormous gamut of styles, acquitted itself most impressively. To cite just two examples, I doubt that there are very many orchestras in the world that could offer virtuoso wind playing of the calibre we heard in the Gavotte With Variations in "Pulcinella," and in the same score I had not heard the doublebass solo more cleanly played than it was this time.

To hear "Pulcinella" at all is a great pleasure. The Suite and orchestral excerpts are done from time to time, but it is not really possible to judge the scope of Stravinsky's achievement except from the entire ballet score. "Pulcinella" is based on music by Pergolesi, and it was one of a series of stylized 18th century ballets produced around 1920 by Diaghilev.

The original production must have been uncommonly brilliant. Massine was the choreographer and danced the title role, Karsavina and Tchernicheva took part, Ansermet conducted, and the sets and costumes were by Picasso. The music is an achievement of wit, elegance, and the greatest beauty of intellect as well as of sound.

Leinsdorf made a persuasive case for it. Now and again it seemed to me that a tempo was miscalculated. For example, the final Minuet with its grave sonorities of bassoons and low horns was rushed and therefore perfunctory. In Stravinsky's own performance the tempo changes from section to section are always very exciting, the perfect symbol of this music's gay capriciousness. Leinsdorf's transitions were a little too rational, and the mad changes of mood were thus slightly flattened out.

In view of all the talk here recently about performance practice problems, I found it interesting that to some of the players Stravinsky's style is at least as alien as that of Bach or of any 18th century composer. If the performance of "Pulcinella" had one general fault it would be that there had not been time to teach all the players the proper style for this music, and to eliminate the pathetic cantabile style which the average orchestral soloist seeks to make his part interesting.

The vocal solos were sung by Grace DiBatista, John Neal, and Francis Hester. All three did well, though that excellent singer Mr. Hester would do still better were he to look more carefully at the words in his part and at the accidentals in it.

Miss DiBatista is something quite special. She is the kind of singer with the ability to make you sit up and take notice; each phrase had the kind of sharp contour that made me suspect that she was more sympatheitcally attuned to the Stravinsky idiom than anyone else on stage.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUL 20 1964

Preconcert BSO Talks To Resume

Henry Portnoi of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again give a series of lectures in advance of each of the concerts by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. The lectures will begin at 7 p.m., one hour before the beginning of the concert, and will be held in the Chamber Music Hall of Tanglewood.

Using examples from the music programmed for the Music Center Orchestra's concerts, Mr. Portnoi is making a pioneer effort to develop in the listener an appreciation of music and its performance. These lectures attracted wide interest last season, and they are designed primarily for older teen-age and adult audiences.

Next week's concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will be given on Thursday, July 23, in the Theatre. Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Music Center, will conduct a program consisting of music by Mozart, Strauss, Schuller and Stravinsky. The remaining Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concerts will be conducted by Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, on Aug. 6, and Richard Burgin on Saturday afternoon, Aug. 22.

The lectures preceding each of these concerts are another part of the series of events open to the members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, those who contribute to the support of the Music Center's activities and scholarship funds.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

JUL 27 1964
NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
AUG 2 1964
NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
AUG 1 1964

Music Center Plans 8 Events Next Week

The Berkshire Music Center will present eight events next week for Friends of the Music Center, those who make a voluntary contribution toward its support.

The Center will be heard in three chamber music programs in the Chamber Music Hall: tomorrow at 8 p.m.; Wednesday, at 8 p.m., and Friday, at 3.30 p.m. The Sunday morning series of the Music of J. S. Bach be in the Theater at 10 a.m. tomorrow and next Sunday.

Monday evening the second Composers Forum will be in the Chamber Music Hall at 8 p.m. On Thursday evening Max Rudolf, Music Director of the Cincinnati Symphony, will conduct the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in his first appearance at Tanglewood.

The weekend will culminate Sunday evening, Aug. 9 at 8 p.m. with the first program of the Berkshire Music Center's five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music presented in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

7/26/64 THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN,

Young Japanese Musicians Show Skill at Tanglewood

65 Members of Touring Toho String Orchestra Center of Admiring Conversation

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Sixty-five highly accomplished young musicians from Japan arrived at Tanglewood in the middle of Monday to pay a social call on the Berkshire Music Center.

They were the Toho Strings—students at Toho Conservatory of Music in Tokyo nearing the end of a 20-day trip to give concerts in Honolulu, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Stamford, Conn., and New York.

The thing that made their visit worthy of more than passing notice was the caliber of their performances.

Performing Ability

Here is an excerpt from a July 15 New York Times report on one of the eight concerts they gave in New York.

"It's a little frightening, the way the youngsters of the Toho String Orchestra played last night at Philharmonic Hall. If they're this good now, what will they be when they're mature artists? So fabulous that they're unbearable, no doubt." And here is a small piece of the Times three days later — "The Toho String Orchestra continued to perform miracles at Philharmonic Hall last night."

After a quick lunch on arrival at Tanglewood Monday, the first thing they did was give a two-hour demonstration of their performing ability. They played music by Mozart, Bloch, Barber, Wolf and Schoenberg and immediately became the center of admiring conversations that spread rapidly all through the 300 members and faculty of the Bershire Music Center hard at work around the Tanglewood "campus."

Student Conductors

The object of all this adulation is called the Toho String Orchestra only for the trip. It is in fact the 61 members of the string section of one of the three orchestras at the Toho Conservatory plus four student conductors, their founder and chief conductor and teacher, Hideo Saito, three professors from the conservatory, one of whom is the trip's administrator, an assistant administrator, a nurse and the mother of one of the violinists, a blind boy.

They prepared repertory of 18 or 20 works from the music of western culture to make up four complete two-hour programs, all of which they presented in New York immediately before visiting Tanglewood for their first day of leisure since July 7 when they left Tokyo.

Monday night the youngsters (age 16 to 22) attended the performance of the Tanglewood Choir in the Theater, and Tuesday, according to Miss Yoshike Shiga, assistant administrator, enjoyed their first full day of musical non-work on the trip.

Those who weren't taking naps were seen all over the grounds all day listening to rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the morning led by William Steinberg for today's performance of Mozart piano sonatas by Claudio Arrau in the Theater and dancing at the party given for them in the Chamber Music Hall by the Tanglewood guides after Arrau's recital.

En Route Home

Wednesday morning they were on their way to give performances in San Francisco and Honolulu before arrival at home in Tokyo Monday.

Aside from the unusual ability of Toho's traveling string players, there are a few remarkable aspects of their emergence in the face of th general shortage of string players over the world.

Toho was founded in 1953. It has 600 students and is the youngest and smallest of Tokyo's four music conservatories. It offers a year-round curriculum (three vacations totalling three months) of liberal arts courses equivalent in the United States to a standard high school and college education with a major in music.

The essential difference between Toho and the other Tokyo music conservatories is that Toho specializes in training musical performers rather than music teachers.

Orchestral performance is required of all students and there are three orchestras with another about to be organized.

The traveling Toho strings came from the school's most accomplished orchestra and played as if it were an adult, top-drawer professional unit long since graduated.

Schuller Performs Modern Classics

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711

JUL 29 1964

LENOX—In the last two years Gunther Schuller has presented a series of concerts in New York designed to offer a combination of contemporary classics—works one needs to know to have some idea of what's happening in the music of our time—and intelligible performances of less established pieces.

Monday evening the Tanglewood audience was offered a typical Schuller program of 20th century music.

Under Schuller's direction the Fromm Fellowship Players performed Luigi Nono's "Polifonica-Monodia-Ritmica," Webern's Concerto For Nine Instruments, Milton Babbitt's Composition For Twelve Instruments, Arthur Berger's Chamber Music For Thirteen Players, Morton Subotnick's Serenade No. 1, and Hindemith's Chamber Music, Opus 24, No. 1.

Webern's piece and Hindemith's, 30 and 40 years old respectively, are familiar classics. Webern's delicate, expressive and witty concerto is more often analyzed than performed, and even the Hindemith is not often heard. I wonder why, for it is enormously effective.

It completely captivated Monday's audience, and what is more to the point, contains fresh and brilliant music. Opening from a shrill, high-tension buzz not unlike the first stages of "Petrouchka," it continues via a rather conventional march and a very lovely woodwind trio to a hectic perpetual motion finale that carries all before it, and would do so even without the ram-bunctious joke with the fire siren on the last page.

Nono's piece and Babbitt's are both descended from Webern, but the two composers drew opposite conclusions from the model before them. If such simplications are tenable at all, the Italian work is all effect, the American one all structure. Both works come early in their composers' careers, and each man could then have learned something from the other, though I fear Mr. Babbitt will hardly thank me for the remark.

Likewise, I'm afraid Mr. Berger may not be grateful if I bracket him with Hindemith. I'm nonetheless tempted to do so, because it struck me so strongly that they, of the composers represented, were the two to whom it should have at some point occurred that they had an audience they might wish to delight.

This comment, let me add, is not intended as a slur on Webern or Babbitt: I'm not talking about degrees of excellence, only about different kinds of qualities.

Berger's Chamber Music is a complete pleasure to listen to. Lucid in form, in the large sense as well as in detail, inventive and original, cleanly scored for its ensemble of string quintet, winds, harp and celesta, it too represents its composer en route to more involved achievements.

It goes back to 1956, and I hope that some of the listeners looked at the date on the program and realized that it antedates Stravinsky's "Agon" which it suggests in so many details. Berger's Chamber Music is a delight, and I hope someone will think to put it on in Boston.

The Subotnick Serenade was wirtten in 1960, and since its composer is still very young, that makes it an extremely early work, one for which its composer will perhaps no longer take complete responsibility.

Scored for cello, mandolin, piano, flute, clarinet, and vibraphone, its sound is transparent and pretty. The many silences and mere literal repetitions almost blot out the main organization of the Serenade into three movements.

There were inconsistencies that puzzled me, and some mild, rather academic jokes with intervals that provided a certain dry pleasure.

Gunther Schuller perpared al the music meticulously, and given the players at his disposal and the limited rehearsal time, he achieved near miracles. Particularly the Subotnick Serenade and large parts of the Berger and Mindemith pieces went very well.

The Fromm Fellowship Players, engaged each Summer to deal with contemporary performance problems at Tanglewood, are this year a rather mixed batch.

Certain ones among them, notably the flutists Elinor Preble and Sophie Sollberger, the violinist Paul Zukofsky, and the percussionist John Bergamo, are obviously of the highest competence; of at least some of the others it must be said that their qualifications for their appointments are not immediately apparent.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,

JUL 28 1964

Music Review

From

By ANDREW CLA

LAST NIGHT at Te
the Fromm Fellows
a concert of contempo
sic in the Theater-Con
This is music that rec too few hearings in p unfortunate state of since, if anything, it more than the usual n presentations to be ful iated because it repres departure from the he past.

One of the basic tene tonal school is the in breaking down of tradi er — the avoidance
reas, rhythmic patte ther established means zation. And it is prec ause of this seeming rder that many people

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

JUL 28 1964

Music Review

Fromm Concert at Tanglewood

By ANDREW CLARKE

LAST NIGHT at Tanglewood Fromm Fellows presented a concert of contemporary music in the Theater-Concert Hall. This is music that receives all too few hearings in public, an unfortunate state of affairs, since, if anything, it requires more than the usual number of presentations to be fully appreciated because it represents such a departure from the norms of the past.

One of the basic tenets of the atonal school is the intentional breaking down of traditional order — the avoidance of tonal areas, rhythmic patterns and other established means of stabilization. And it is precisely because of this seeming lack of order that many people become totally confused. I do believe that an awareness of what actually lies on the printed score enhances the listener's prospects of comprehension, but the music should never be summarily dismissed just because it sounds strange at a single hearing. Twelve-tone composers themselves admit that they're just beginning to scratch the surface at this point, and they at least deserve time for a perspective on our part.

* * *

THE PROGRAM opened with Luigi Nono's "Polifonica — Monodia — Ritmica," vintage 1951, which was not entirely without occasional instances of tonality. These tended to appear and disappear very quickly, however. The only careless playing of the evening occurred in the opening passage of this piece, which began with a barely audible cymbal, followed by single-note statements on the flute, clarinet, etc. Perhaps the double pianissimo markings were the cause of the trouble, but at any rate the first measures were not entirely under control. These gradually built up into a more polyphonic statement and the playing then became more assured. It should be mentioned at the outset that Gunther Schuller's conducting was outstanding, as he demonstrated an awareness of and control over some very difficult material all evening.

* * *

ANTON WEBERN'S "Konzert, Op. 24" was next, and like much of his music, was brief, and to the point. Some consider Webern, Schoenberg's arch-disciple, to be atonal music's great purist, for he does not run his ideas into the ground. Particularly interesting in this piece was the second movement, marked "sehr langsam," in which he made use of alternating thirds and sevenths in the piano part against interjections by the other instruments. Milton Babbitt's "Composition for Twelve Instruments" was a good example of variance in tone color as it built in intensity to some jarring chords at the close. Of the four pieces in the first half, however, I liked Arthur Berger's "Chamber Music for Thirteen Players" best, for he gave each instrument more than single notes at a time. The result was somehow a more substantial, more readily comprehensible statement of thematic materials. Mr. Berger was on hand to acknowledge the audience's appreciation.

* * *

IN THE SECOND half, Serenade No. 1 by Morton Subotnick, written in 1960 and the most recent of the compositions presented, was highly percussive but confusing to me. I should like to hear it again before commenting further. Mr. Subotnick was also in the audience. The program closed with Paul Hindemith's "Kammermusic No. 1, Op. 24 No. 1," which was as comfortable as an old shoe after what had transpired earlier. Hindemith was not a 12-tone composer; in fact, he was one of the few great traditionalists in this century, which has caused many of his contemporaries to dismiss him as unoriginal. Hindemith had plenty of originality, but it was as a craftsman. This composition, in four movements, demonstrates his keen awareness of the capabilities of the instruments he wrote for. In the third movement, for example, there was a beautifully, slow-moving counterpoint treatment of themes involving a clarinet, flute and bassoon. And the last movement was a whirlwind of compelling motion that swept the audience along in exciting fashion, and featured some virtuoso playing by first violinist Paul Zukofsky.

Considerable credit is due to the Fromm Fellows, who were assisted by a few faculty members. Their playing was, on the whole, very competent and very sympathetic to the highly complex idiom in which they worked.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 32,000

JUL 28 1964

Beaux Arts Trio to Air Mozart Work

The Beaux Arts Trio of New York will present the fifth chamber music concert of the season at the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., tonight at 8. The program will include Mozart's "Trio in B Flat, K. 254," Ravel's "Trio in A Minor" and Dvorak's "Trio in E Minor, Op. 90 (Dumky)."

William Steinberg will begin the program Friday at 8 p.m. by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Walter Piston's "Toccata." Joseph de Pasquala, viola, and Samuel Mayes, cello, will be the soloists in Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote." The program will close with Brahms' "Symphony No. 1, Op. 68."

The orchestra will hold its open rehearsal Saturday at 10 a.m.

Saturday at 8 p.m. the orchestra directed by Eugene Ormandy will present the "Leonore Overture, No. 1," Beethoven; "Symphony No. 1, Op. 21," Beethoven; and "Symphony No. 1 in D Major," Mahler.

The concert Sunday at 2:30 p.m. will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The program will include "Symphony No. 6, Op. 60," Dvorak; "Violin Concerto No. 2," Bartok, with Joseph Silverstein as soloist; and the Prelude and Waltz Sequence from Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier."

Six programs at the festival will be open this week to the Friends of the Music Center. These will include chamber music concerts Wednesday at 8 p.m., Friday at 3:30 p.m. and Sunday at 8 p.m. A program by the Fromm Fellows will be given tonight at 8. This group of young musicians is specializing this summer in contemporary music. The Tanglewood Choir will be heard Thursday at 8 p.m. and a Bach program will be given Sunday at 10 a.m.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUL 29 1964

Concert Review

Beaux Arts Trio In Concert Hall At Tanglewood

Beaux Arts Trio of New York, Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood, Lenox; with Menahem Pressler, piano; Daniel Guilet, violin and Bernard Greenhouse, cello.

Divertimento (Trio) in B flat, K 254 Mozart
Trio in A minor Ravel
Dumky-Trio in E minor, Op. 90 Dvorak

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

The fifth program of the Chamber Music Series at Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall seemed designed for July's relentless weather; cool, soft, gracious and without any great demands on intellects already sagging in humidity.

Beyond Discussion

Mozart's Divertimento, like much of his music, seems beyond discussion. It is music of a conservative that in many hands sounds today almost commonplace, yet, in concert with the Beaux Arts Trio it had an unspoiled freshness. With the lid just cracked open on the piano, the sound seemed romantic and ethereal (like much of the program), but still, there was the original character of Mozart that seems like music before mankind had fallen into original sin. Whether Mozart be connected with Italian barbers or Turkish potentates, he is so tasteful and polite one wonders if he actually sees such characters as more than guileless people on a guileless earth. Thus to an audience heated by nature, obvious to the disorders of a long, hot summer the piece was momentary relief, as welcome as a sweet rain.

The second work of the program was Ravel's only trio. It was, with the piano still muted by its lid, perhaps too mushy, too lacking in percussive contrast to do full justice to the lively second movement "pantoum." Perhaps there was also too lugubrious a character to the passacaglia used in the 3rd movement, but there was still ample undulance, color and power to the work that was not lost to the listener. Ravel is not really sophisticated when compared with, say Debussy, but the reality of his music seems admirably not out of touch with a sort of impressionism with a heart beat.

The final work by Dvorak based on the dumka is not, to this listener, the acme of musical expression. A dumka, by the way, is the slavic song that changes rapidly from hot to cold or melancholy to exuberance. The work seems artificial, though no doubt it isn't, but also in its old world temperment and dress, it appears passe as Hearts and Flowers. Having shown my bias there seems little reason to discuss it further. Surely no trio could have given the work more justice than did this admirable group.

There remains in this Chamber Series three concerts that would for many reasons be unwise for chamber buffs to miss. Aug. 4 brings pianist Jorge Bolet and Aug. 18, soprano Phyllis Curtin to the stage. A third concert will be included in programs running from Sunday evening, Aug. 9 through Thursday, Aug. 13; a kind of Festival within the Berkshire Festival that will provide the listener with a rough idea of what the musical world is coming to. The results may well open one's eyes via his ears.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193

JUL 29 1964

Beaux Arts Trio Lively and Sad At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—The Beaux Arts Trio of New York soon shed Mozart's happy gaiety for Ravel's serious business after it began its performance for 1056 in the theater at Tanglewood Tuesday night in the fifth of the chamber music concert series.

Mozart Trio

The program opened with Mozart's Trio in B Flat, K 254, which sandwiches a lovely, lyrical movement between a couple of divertimento-style movements typical of his party music.

It didn't last long. Ravel's trio in A minor soon followed, and that work is no party matter. After intermission there was Dvorak's Dumky Trio in E Minor, Op. 90, a six movement work that alternately presents both moods heard before intermission, party dances and melancholy lament.

The Dvorak work, however, makes the switch frequently with melodies and rhythms of Ukrainian folk origin. The listener is hardly adjusted to a soulfully slow strain before he finds himself caught up in a fast gypsy jive.

The Mozart piece didn't make much use of Bernard Greenhause, cellist, because about all he was asked to do was double the low notes on the piano, played by Menahem Pressler.

Agile Player

But he was agile enough later on as well as accurate and skilful at producing a pleasing tone.

Pressler was the spark of the trio. He bobbed and weaved and frowned and smiled and kept close watch on his colleagues, Greenhause and Daniel Guilet, violinist. Also, he handled his instrument with a master's control of nuance.

Guilet's violin began the Mozart with a wirey, edgy tone that didn't entirely disappear all evening, although it warmed up somewhat during Dvorak's romantic Dumka.

(There was a very shrill cricket in the rafters during the Dvorak Trio; it stuck on one note, but a quick, limited survey didn't turn up anyone who knew what the note was.)

First Rate Trio

The Beaux Arts Trio is a first rate trio. Tuesday night, although there were two or three wrong notes, there was not a single easily noticeable instance of missed coordination.

All entries and exits were immaculate, and all accents, shifts of tempo and changes of direction were accomplished as if by one man.

All in all, even though the Mozart and Dvorak were given the best of treatment, second thoughts led to the conclusion that the Ravel trio, a work full of depth and breadth as well as substance and vigor, stood up best in performance as well as composition.

England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal Record
AMHERST, Mass.
eekly Circ. 2,205

AUG 25 1964

Beaux Arts Trio At Tanglewood

At next weekend's Berkshire Festival concerts in the Music Shed at Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf has once again invited William Steinberg and Eugene Ormandy to be guest conductors. Mr. Steinberg, Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, will conduct on Friday evening (July 31, 8:00 p.m.). Mr. Ormandy, Music Director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will conduct Saturday evening. (Aug. 1, 8:00 p.m.) and Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the concert of Sunday afternoon (Aug. 2, 2:30 p.m.).

This coming Tuesday evening (July 28) the Beaux Arts Trio of New York will make an appearance at Tanglewood, for the fifth Chamber Music Concert of the season in the Theatre at 8:00 p.m. The Trio, which consists of Menahem Pressler, pianist; Daniel Guilet, violinist; and Bernard Greenhouse, 'cellist, will begin the program with Mozart's Trio in B-flat, K. 254. They will continue with Ravel's Trio in A minor, and conclude with the Dvorak Trio in E minor, Op. 90 ("Dumky").

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

AUG 8 1964

Bach Event Is Announced For Sunday

The program for this Sunday's concert of the "Music of J. S. Bach" series at Tanglewood will include Igor Kipnis, a member of the Berkshire Music Center faculty, playing the harpsichord solo in the Brandenburg Concerto No. 5.

The concert will begin at 10 a.m. in the Theater, and is open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

The complete program will be as follows: Two Chorale Preludes for Organ, Cantata No. 84, Sonata No. 2 in A Major and the Brandenburg No. 5.

Knickerbocker News Albany 7/29/64

At the Concert

Beaux Arts Trio -- Ensemble Playing at Its Best

TRIO THRILLS TANGLEWOOD—The Beaux Arts Trio, with violinist Daniel Guilet, pianist Menahem Pressler and cellist Bernard Greenhouse, thrilled the chamber music audience at the Tanglewood festival concert last night with their fine playing of Ravel, Mozart and Dvorak.

By DANIEL L. CUSICK

THE Beaux Arts Trio, playing at Tanglewood last night, held to the true spirit of chamber music. They performed for, and with, each other and let the audience listen to the splendid music coming from their midst. Each of the players has molded his talents to conform to the group, eliminating any show of solo talents.

In a program of Mozart, Ravel and Dvorak the trio, once again demonstrated that they are the ensemble to be put up for comparison when it comes to naming the great trios.

The incomparable blend of sound gives the impression that it comes from one source rather than the minds and instruments of three different personalities.

★ ★ ★

PIANIST Menahem Pressler, violinist Daniel Guilet and cellist Bernard Greenhouse watch each other constantly for nuances which may influse into the material. The feeling of rapport between them is a marvel to watch, let alone hear.

In Ravel's "Trio in A minor," there are many spots in which any one of the men could be carried away with a concern for his own difficult part, leaving the remaining two instrumentalists to straggle along behind. This never happens. Measure by measure there is a unity, found in only a few of the great groups, which ties the whole of the Ravel playing into a neat and expressively played work.

Based on the performance at the chamber music shed, one would wish to hear any of the trio break into virtuoso solo passages. This is the very thing which maintains the interest. The fine talents being sublimated to the good of the ensemble increases the attention and the appreciation during the course of the concert.

★ ★ ★

GUILET shows all the signs of being the perfect trio violinist. His technique is beyond reproach and his sense of line and blend is marvelous.

Menahem Pressler is a little too flowery in his gestures, but the sound is, again, one which is complimentary to the trio.

Greenhouse must be considered the master cellist in any of the permanently established performing trios. His dual tone, one in the strings and one emanating from the body o the cello, combine to produce an entirely unique combination but one which seems to add an extra voice to the unit.

★ ★ ★

THE TRIO went rom the thoughtful Ravel work into the Dvork "Dumky Trio in E minor" with all its folk motifs used as a direct contrast to the preceeding piece. The inherent playfulness of the Dvorak score was read through with subtle humor and the same beautiful consideration which had been given to the earlier compositions.

As an added fillip, the group rewarded the appreciative audience with the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Trio No. 1."

It took five curtain calls to satisfy the crowd's show of praise for the lovely evening o music making.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

JUL 29 1964

Music Review

Beaux Arts Trio

By JAY ROSENFELD

THE BEAUX Arts Trio concert in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood last night was one of the few evenings of real chamber music in the so-called Chamber Music Series. Pianist Menahem Pressler, violinist Daniel Guilet and cellist Bernard Greenhouse played one of the late Mozart trios, the Ravel and Dvorak's "Dumka" Trio.

The distinction of the Beaux Arts is their ensemble. It is not mere precision but a unamimity of feeling which makes their playing as one. And still no three men could bring such different brushes to their easel. The violinist uses weak, superficial pastels for a water color; his confreres use vivid and penetrating oils on their canvas. Only the homogeneity of their musicianship makes up for the variance of the tone qualities they individually produce.

* * *

THE DVORAK is extremely agreeable music, alternating between yearning melancholy and boisterous gaiety, and served perfectly as a vent for the composer's emotionally complex and fiery temperament. A "Dumka" is evidently a Bohemian lament or elegy and is possibly the source of our word "dump," a dull, gloomy state of mind. Shakespeare speaks of "doleful dumps the mind oppress."

It obviously has a wide latitude of expression for Dvorak links a half dozen in some sort of a suite rather than in contrasted movements. He wrote it about the time of his American sojourn in the mid-'90s, and musicologists find support for their theories either to sustain or oppose their contention that his music was affected by his "New World" contacts.

* * *

THE RAVEL, on the other hand, flows from the pen rather than from the heart. It is worlds apart from the Dvorak which had preceded it by a mere 20 years. Rhythmically intricate, harmonically daring, or even nonchalant, no one would ever mention remotely that Ravel went to folk tunes, as did Dvorak, for any part of his trip. It is thoroughly metropolitan, spirited and colorful, using every possible device to produce strange, beautiful and new effects. The "Pantoum" is an astonishing movement in which the alternating lines of a four-line verse are carried forward for the succeeding verse, but in Ravel's hand this becomes a pinnacle of virtuosity.

* * *

THE TRIO with which the program began was one of the masterworks Mozart wrote for this combination. The B Flat, (K. 502 has a deeply felt larghetto, and the two surrounding movements are close to concerto style. For an encore they played the same Mendelssohn scherzo that they have usually offered Tanglewood audiences as a lagniappe

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193

AUG 5 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 176,483

AUG 5 1964

Rudolf, Hollander To Participate in Tanglewood Events

Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, recently appointed chairman of the new conductors' course at Tanglewood, will conduct the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra tomorrow at 8 p.m. in the Theatre at Tanglewood.

Rudolf will also be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening, Aug. 14.

Lorin Hollander, the noted 20-year-old pianist, will be guest soloist with Rudolf and the Music Center Orchestra, performing Ernest Bloch's "Scherzo Fantasque."

Hollander will also be guest artist the following week with the Boston Symphony.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240

JUL 29 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499

JUL 29 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

JUL 29 1964

Solo Concert Replaces Choir At Tanglewood

The Berkshire Music Center announces that the concert which was scheduled to be given this Thursday evening at 8 by the Tanglewood Choir has been canceled and that a song recital by members of the new Solo Vocal Department will be presented in its place. The program will be given in the Theater and will be a Friends event, for those who make a voluntary contribution toward the support of the Center.

The program will be as follows:

Two Songs, Op. 91	Brahms
Five Greek Songs (sung in Greek)	Ravel
Three Traditional Rhymes	Webern
Three Songs for Soprano, Piano, Violin, Viola and Two Clarinets	Ives
Chanson Perpetuelle for Soprano	Chausson
As It Fell Upon a Day	Copland
An die Ferne Geliebte	Beethoven
Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen	Mahler
Her Hirt auf dem Felsen
Auf dem Strom	Schubert

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Review
DARIEN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,690

Bolet To Play

JORGE BOLET

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood will present a program entirely of orchestral works, a program emphasizing vocal works, and a program featuring piano with orchestra at its Beskshire Festival concerts next Friday and Saturday, August 7 and 8, evenings, and Sunday, August 9, afternoon, in the Music Shed Eric Leinsdorf, music director, and Richard Burgin, his associate, will conduct. Patrons will hear five works which have not previously been performed at Tanglewood. Soloists will include Jorge Bolet, pianist; Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Justino Diaz, bass;

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923

AUG 4 1964

Bolet in Piano Recital At Tanglewood Tonight

Jorge Bolet will present a piano recital at 8 tonight in the theater at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

* * *

THE PROGRAM, which will be the sixth in a series of chamber music concerts, will consist of the Sonata in A flat, Op. 110, by Beethoven, and Liszt's "Twelve Etudes d'Execution Transcendante."

The Boston symphony will present a program entirely of orchestral works, a program emphasizing vocal works and a program featuring piano with orchestra at its concerts Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

Richard Burgin, associate conducter, will lead the orchestra at 8 p.m. Friday. The first half of the program will be Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74, "Pathetique." Following intermission the orchestra will play "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee" by Gunther Schuller and Debussy's "La Mer." Schuller is acting head of the department of composition of the Berkshire Music Center.

* * *

THE SATURDAY and Sunday concerts, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, will present works by Richard Strauss in the continuing observance of the composer's 100th aniversary, and works which Leinsdorf has termed music for festivals.

Saturday's program will open with "The Ruins of Athens," Nachspiel, Op. 113, by Beethoven, with Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Justino Diaz, bass; and the Berkshire Festival chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon. Miss Curtin will return to sing "Three Themes," Op. 71 by Strauss. The program will close with the eastern premiere of Menotti's "The Death of Bishop Brindisi," with Lili Chookasian, contralto; Diaz, and the festival chorus.

* * *

SUNDAY AT 2:30 p.m. Leinsdorf will open the concert with "Symphonic Metamorphosis" by Paul Hindemith, who died last fall. He will continue with Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120. After intermission Bolet will join the orchestra at the piano for Strauss' "Parergon," for left hand alone, which has been performed only once before in this country, in 1934. Bolet and the orchestra will close the program with Liszt's "Fantasie" on themes from "Ruins of Athens."

The center's five-day festival of contemporary music will begin Sunday evening with a program at 8 in the theater. It will feature the Fromm Fellows in works by contemporary young American composers who have not yet gained national recognition, including 10 works commissioned especially for this festival.

* * *

FOUR EVENTS have been scheduled for members of the Friends of the Music Center, those who make contributions to the center's financial support. Members of the center will be heard in chamber music programs at 8 p.m. Wednesday and at 3:30 p.m. Friday. The second "Composers Forum" will be at 8 tonight in Chamber Music Hall. The Sunday morning series of concerts of music by Bach will continue with a program at 10 this weekend.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 93,580

AUG 1964

AT TANGLEWOOD

Pianist Jorge Bolet and soprano Phyllis Curtin will highlight this week's concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival in Lenox.

Bolet will play Tuesday evening and Sunday afternoon while Miss Curtin performs Saturday night with the Festival chorus.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News
WEST HARTFORD, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,670

JUL 30 1964

The Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood continue as per schedule; the unusual feature this week will be a piano recital by Jorge Bolet on Tuesday, August 4 at 8 p.m. in the Theatre. This fine pianist has been heard as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on previous occasions. This is a rare opportunity to hear Mr. Bolet in recital.

NEWSCLIP
Circ. 29,304

AUG 5 1964

Music Review

Jorge Bolet in Tanglewood Chamber Concert

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE SIXTH concert of the "chamber music series" at Tanglewood was a piano recital by Jorge Bolet last night in the Theater-Concert Hall. The recital was excellent. Why those in authority choose to offer everything but chamber music on the "chamber music series" is not explained.

Bolet took on a herculean task: One of the last Beethoven sonatas, the A Flat Major, Opus 110, and the Liszt coruscant "Transcendental Studies," half of which he played after the Beethoven and the others after an intermission. He proved himself a master of both styles.

* * *

BEETHOVEN at this stage of his career abandoned the classic sequence of movements in his sonatas, as he did in the late quartets, and wrote with a freedom and sense of contrast which in later composers would become tone poems. Bolet approached the sonata as an orchestral conductor, and had his right hand play the initial simple little song as thought it were an oboe with a little support in the strings. Indeed, later in the Liszt, he made the incessant tremolos sound like thundering tympani in the study, "Vision," and at another time in "Chasse-Neige" like shivering cymbals. He gave the impression of directing instead of actually performing.

Bolet grasped the essential of his Beethoven and kept the suddenly shifting moods in proportion. In such a detail as the coda of the allegro he achieved a miniature masterpiece of shape within so few notes, and he kept the fugue within clear logic. The inversion could not have been made more apparent except with a blackboard pointer. This was thoroughly mature Beethoven playing.

* * *

BOLET KEPT his audience at breathless tension with a dazzling display of pianism with his Liszt, There is no more vacuous music on the printed page. It is all glamor and no substance. It reminds one of those musical comedy young ladies who in some cases, I'm told, wear enormous, fantastic headwear and little else.

They were the expressions of the phenomenal young composer in his teens when he was astonishing Europe as it never before had been overwhelmed by a keyboard. The instrument in Liszt's day was not the one we know today.

Bolet performed like an Olympic champion. He seemed exhausted at the conclusion, although he was able to walk off as the audience gave him an enthusiastic ovation. I didn't stay to see if the piano was carried off on a stretcher.

* * *

THERE IS little harmonic interest and the delayed cadences in some cases are provoking. They are used to permit still another flamboyant roulade well beyond satiety. But they demand hands of Gargantuan size, strength of a Gulliver or a Samson, and the imagination of a Baron Munchausen. All these Bolet had in abundance, and, taken for what they are, they are an interesting exhibit in the museum of the piano.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,499

AUG 4 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240

AUG 5 1964

Max Rudolph To Conduct Center Group Tomorrow

Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, who was recently appointed chairman of the new Conductors' Course at Tanglewood which was established as a tribute of friendship to the late Pierre Monteux, will conduct the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra for the first time tomorrow evening at 8 p.m. in the theater at Tanglewood. Mr. Rudolf will also be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time on Friday evening of next week.

Lorin Hollander, the noted 20-year-old pianist, will be guest soloist with Mr. Rduolf and the Music Center Orchestra Thursday, performing Ernest Bloch's "Scherzo Fantasque." Mr. Hollander will also be guest artist in the following week with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The complete program for the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert tomorrow, its third of the season, will be as follows: Sinfonie Singuliere by Berwald; Five Episodes for Orchestra by Trimble; Bloch's "Scherzo Fantasque); and the Symphony No. 4 of Brahms.

Before the concert, beginning at 7 p.m., Henry Portnoi of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third of his series of lectures which precede each Music Center Orchestra concert, in the Chamber Music Hall. Using examples from the music to be programmed, Mr. Portnoi offers to interested listeners the opportunity to better appreciate the performance. These lectures have attracted wide interest, and are designed primarily for older teenage and adult audiences.

The lecture and concert will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, those who make a contribution to the support of the Center. Contributions may be made in person at the Friends Office at the main gate of Tanglewood or by mail to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, 01240. A membership card entitles the holder to attend all Music Center events for the remainder of the season.

129

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193

AUG 5 1964

Jorge Bolet Gives Concert At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

TANGLEWOOD—Jorge Bolet played all 12 of Liszt's Etudes d'Execution Transcendante Tuesday night in the theater at Tanglewood. He played Beethoven's Sonata No. 31, Op. 110, also, and Beethoven came out second best.

Big and Burly

If Liszt was as big and burly in 1852 as Bolet is in 1964, it is not difficult to understand why the strings popped and the hammers flew out of Liszt's pianos. Of course, the pianos were a lot weaker a hundred years ago, but an instrument would have to be impervious to withstand the thumping needed to produce the thunderous music made by Bolet according to Liszt's instructions Tuesday.

Six of the "Transcendental" Studies were played before intermission right after Beethoven in the following order: 1, 2, 3, 5, 11 and 4. The others followed intermission in this sequence: 7, 6, 12, 10, 9 and 8. But whatever sequence Bolet chose, the performance did not occur on one of his better nights.

His performance of the gentle Beethoven sonata is better left undiscussed. It was brittle and somehow without much feeling, except, perhaps, for a while near the end.

Known for Technique

Bolet is better known for his nearly unbelievable talent for covering the keyboard according to the gospel of Liszt.

But Tuesday night he unaccountably missed several notes. There were fumbles that might be expected from most all pianists except the double handful who can play such thunder and lightning as Liszt wrote into the "Transcendental" Studies. Bolet is one of them — but not Tuesday.

There were, however, several happy stretches of sound. There was subtlety and romance in the 11th study, "Feux Gollets" (played fifth), and in the 12th "Ricordanza" (played ninth). And there were superbly controlled gigantic handsful of notes that seemed like a whole orchestra in the fourth, "Mazeppa" (played sixth) and in the 11th, "Harmonies du Soir" (played fifth).

The incredible virtuosity required to cover the keyboard for the "Transcendental" Studies is an accomplishment by itself, so the few missed notes can be forgiven easily.

Beethoven at Arm's Length

It seemed paradoxical, however, to hear Bolet put much more understanding into the Liszt than into the Beethoven. Admittedly, a Beethoven sonata should receive a caress where the Liszt should be kissed, but it wasn't quite necessary to play the Beethoven at arm's length.

The recital, while satisfying in many ways, didn't begin to reach the level of musicianship, accuracy and sheer impact of his performance a year ago when he played the Prokofieff Third Piano Concerto in the Shed at Tanglewood. He will be in the Shed with the orchestra again next Sunday to play music by Liszt and Strauss.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 144,855
AUG 7 1964

Rudolf, Berkshire Orchestra In Lacklustre Program

BY MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX—For the third of its concerts this Summer, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra was conducted by Max Rudolf, who works regularly out of Cincinnati, and who will conduct a Boston Symphony concert on the 14th.

He chose a program of considerable interest: Berwald's "Sinfonie Singuliere" Lester Trimble's "Five Episodes for Orchestra", Bloch's "Scherzo Fastasque for Piano and Orchestra" and the Brahms Fourth.

Franz Berwald was Sweden's best composer in the 19th century, which is not a really glorious example of the qualified superlative. Eccentric as man and musician, he was unable to make a completely successful career, and for many years was obliged to earn his living in Vienna as a teacher of orthopedic gymnastics.

As a composer he was full of fascinating ideas, but he was a man who could be creative only in details and who allowed the detail to be choked to death by the squareness of the overall framework.

The "Sinfonie Singuliere," composed in 1845, contains many charming bizarre touches, especially in the realm of harmonic twists, and there are many time when his language becomes momentarily quite conventional. He obviously was an inventive man, but, hobbled by convential ideas of form, he lacked a language in which to compose.

Two Berwald symphonies including the "Singuliere" were recorded about eight years ago in very stylish readings by Markevich, and for a while the pieces had quite a vogue. I wager that had they been introduced in performances by Mr. Rudolf they would have made no more stir than they had in the previous hundred years.

Trimble's "Episodes" are, I imagine, written as means of demonstrating to provincial audiences that this modern stuff really isn't so terrible. Trimble, with the basis of this work, I hesitate to call a composer, has assembled some of the more ingratiating gestural and instrumental details from quite a varied 20th century literature, and has coupled them together as a series of effects without causes, and, come to think, without much effect either.

Bloch's "Scherzo Fantasque" was written in 1948 as a potboiler, or at least I hope so. Stylistically it lies somewhere between Prokofiev and Rachmaninoff. Judged as an artistic achievement of accomplishment and taste the "Scherzo Fantasque" must be granted a secure place distinctly higher than that of the "Warsaw Concerto." Hollander is very accurate and he bangs.

I am not sure I know quite what to make of Rudolf. I wish I could forget how very badly he conducts Rossini and Verdi, because it seems unfair to judge his present work with some ineradicable evenings at the Metropolitan Opera still in my memory. He still seems to me a conductor rather more prosaic than the music he performs. He is not personally showy and he makes no improper intrusions upon the music. Even though he is the author of a textbook on conducting, he was unable, in as much of the Brahms Symphony as I heard, to steer the orchestra safely through its complex cross rhythms and syncopations. It was not one of music's happier evenings at Tanglewood.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
AUG 7 1964

Music Review

Student Concert at Tanglewood

By ANDREW CLARKE

THE BERKSHIRE Music Center Student Orchestra presented its third concert of the season last night in the Theater-Concert Hall, and gave a good account of itself.

The program was a mixture of romantic and modern music, and ranged from the very well known 4th Symphony of Brahms to Trimble's "Five Episodes for Orchestra," written in 1962. The orchestra, under the direction of Max Rudolf, seemed at home in both idioms, however.

* * *

THE FIRST composition of the evening was Berwald's "Sinfonie Singuliere," composed in 1845, which I found to be long on musical gimmicks and short on substance. Indeed, the piece occasionally sounded like something Mozart might have written, only with more modern harmonies added and including a much larger range of dynamic and texture variation than the Austrian would have employed. It was a very gay piece and both fun and interesting to listen to, but it hardly belongs in any listing of distinguished symphonic works.

At times the orchestra's articulation was outstanding and its playing on the whole was assured. However, there were instances of fuzziness of line, especially in some of the slower string ensemble sections. But this is obviously the result of the players' not having had the opportunity to perform countless concerts over the years — the only way an entire section can eventually come to sound as one single instrument.

* * *

THE TRIMBLE work was next, a tonal composition that experimented with orchestral effects, which I thought was as successful as it was original. Although the Five Episodes were without names, they might well have been, for it was the kind of music that easily conjures up images of one sort or another. One passage in particular that stuck in my mind employed an eerie violin line that kept backing and filling on itself as it slowly climbed up the scale, and all against a steady drone by the cellos and occasional interjections by the woodwinds. The only adjective I could think of to describe the musical result was "sweltering." The piece was intriguing. Mr. Trimble was in the audience to take a bow.

Ernest Bloch's "Scherzo Fantasque" for piano and orchestra closed the first half of the program, and I thought it was easily the high point of the evening. Pianist Lorin Hollander was nothing short of brilliant as he tore through this very dynamic and difficult work in el trifying fashion. The piano part calls for both agility and explosive playing and Mr. Hollander was competent in both departments. I have seldom heard a better performance at Tanglewood for sheer excitement and virtuosity.

Lorin Hollander

* * *

"SYMPHONY No. 4 in E Minor" by Brahms was given a sensitive reading by Mr. Rudolf and the orchestra. I particularly liked the first movement, in which a slightly slower-than-usual tempo was used to good effect. There were a few wrong notes here and there, and at times the brass players were a bit too brassy, but these were minor considerations. In discussing a work that has been recorded by most of the world's great orchestras, it's easy to quibble over the efforts of a lesser group. This was a solid performance.

The second movement was delicate and nicely phrased, and the third was as exuberant as it should have been. Only in the opening measures of the fourth movement was the playing somewhat faulty, and again this appeared to be the result of the orchestra's not having worked together long enough. Some of the interchanges between the sections were not entirely smooth.

The total effect, however, was that the music performed last night, although ambitious, was well executed.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
GARDNER, Mass.
Circ. 7,341
AUG 14 1964

Wuorinen's Music Featured At Tanglewood Youth Week

PAGE ONE

Composer Charles Wuorinen, son of Dr. and Mrs. John H. Wuorinen of Columbia University and 167 Elm Street, played his own "Piano Variations" last night at Tanglewood, the Berkshire music center in Lenox, as part of the program for Tanglewood's Youth Week. It was received warmly by the large appreciative audience.

Youth Week opened Monday and one of the first night features was Mr. Wuorinen's chamber concerto for flute and ten players, written for the flutist-composer Harvey Soliberger. Of Wuorinen's composing abilities the New York Herald Tribune stated Tuesday:

"The big new piece was Charles Wuorinen's chamber concerto for flute and ten players. Wuorinen, an enormously gifted young man, is one of the few younger composers who has boldly worked at the problem of big gesture and big form.

"The new piece works. Written for the flutist-composer Harvey Soliberger, it grows right out of the extraordinary range of Soliberger's flute sound and technique which is made to emerge gradually from the ensemble play of intensities and textures."

"The solo sounds climb from rock flute bottom to tip-top and then some. The range of accents and dynamics is incredible and effects like the use of a controlled increasing and decreasing vibrato on held notes must be heard to be believed. This music whistles, hoots, splutters, hisses, rumbles, clatters and shakes; timbres, textures and intensities function as the themes of the piece. This is a good deal more than a mere matter of clever sound; the piece has sense and expressive imagination as well."

Wuorinen's piano playing abilities are also highly regarded. He first presented his Piano Variations on Jan 13, 1964 at Columbia University and the New York Herald Tribune had this to say:

"Mr. Wuorinen gets up and down the piano the way Mr. Soliberger gets up and down the flute (that's why they make such a good team) and the pianists's own music is brilliantly calculated to show off his enormous strength and virtuoso keyboard agility. It's a good piece too, a veritable storm, a blizzard, but imaginative and coherent as well."

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4220
WATERBURY, CONN.
Sunday Republican
Sun. Circ. 50,455
AUG 16 1964

PHYLLIS CURTIN, soprano, will present a Chamber Music Concert on Tuesday at 8 p. m. in the Tanglewood Theatre, Lenox, Mass. The program will include works by Mozart, Berg, Wolf, R. Strauss, and contemporary Latin American and American songs.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193

3 New Works Are Offered At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Three more compositions received their first, and possibly last, public performances Wednesday night in the theater at Tanglewood.

Ends Tonight

They were works commissioned by the Fromm Foundation, sponsor, with the Berkshire Music Center for the festival of contemporary American music which ends tonight.

Ten works were commissioned for first performance during the festival and seven have been heard. Those on the program Wednesday night were written by Randolph Coleman of Evanston, Ill., David Del Tredici and Harvey Sollberger of New York.

Tonight this festival for new music within the Berkshire Festival will present the final three commissioned works, those by Robert Newell of Urbana, Ill., Donald Martino of New Haven and John MacIvor Perkins of Chicago to wind up a five-day event that already has increased the stature of Tanglewood as probably the home of the leading summer music festival in the world.

Coleman's Concerto

Coleman's concerto for piano and chamber orchestra was the first of Wednesday first performances. It presented an orchestra of 14 players including three who manned a large collection of percussion instruments.

The piece started with a single loud, plucked piano string and in 10 or 12 minutes presented many short bursts of melodic percussion, long sessions of single, isolated very short notes in rapid succession from all directions and many unpredictible flurries of sound, an occasional flurry containing a touch of traditional harmony.

The second of the commissioned works heard was "I hear an Army" for soprano and string quartet by Del Tredici.

Very Complex Pieces

It was conducted by the composer who led his performers through a very complex piece. It was wildly dissonant, harmonically thick and beset with rapidly changing tempos.

The soprano was obliged to hit notes accurately at the extreme ends of her vocal range, without assistance but was consistantly able to reach them with solid strength.

The piece was perhaps the most powerful, substantial and successful new work so far presented in the festival.

Players in Trouble

The third new work Wednesday night was Sollberger's chamber variations for 12 players and conductor.

Its extreme difficulty ran the players into trouble, and caused the conductor, Gunther Schuller, to stop the music and start again.

The work consisted mostly of spasms of sound, fragmented phrases and a total unpredictability according to traditional standards.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Free Press
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,179
AUG 15 1964

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. — PHYLLIS CURTIN, Soprano, will present a Chamber Music Concert on Tuesday evening (August 18) at 8 p.m. in the Tanglewood Theatre. The program will include works by Mozart, Berg, Wolf, R. Strauss, and contemporary Latin American and American songs.

PHYLLIS CURTIN AT TANGLEWOOD

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER STRING SYMPOSIUM AND GALA EVENING THIS WEEK

The Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will enter the final week of the 1964 season this week. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, will present its final three concerts in the Music Shed on Friday and Saturday evenings (Aug. 21-22) at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoon (Aug. 30) at 2:30, its final Open Rehearsal next Saturday morning (Aug. 22) at 10 a.m. and its final Chamber Music Concert this Tuesday evening (Aug. 18) at 8 p.m. The Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, will come to a close with a full week of events scheduled, including the String Symposium this Sunday and Monday (Aug. 16-17) and the great Gala Evening benefit Wednesday evening (Aug. 19).

The final Tuesday Evening Chamber Music Concert will be held this Tuesday (Aug. 18) at 8 p.m. in the Theatre. Phyllis Curtin, soprano, who was soloist at the Festival concert of August 8 and is on the faculty of the Music Center's Vocal Department this summer, will give a recital of songs by Mozart, Wolf, Berg, Strauss, and contemporary Latin American and American songs. Ryan Edwards will be her accompanist.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 176,483
AUG 20 1964

Tanglewood Program Set for Saturday

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will give its last concert of the season Saturday afternoon at 3:30 in the Theatre at Tanglewood.

Richard Burgin, head of the Music Center's Department of Instrumental Music, will conduct. The program will consist of the Symphony No. 1 by Sibelius; Copland's Short Symphony; No. 3; and the Overture and Incidental Music to "Egmont" by Beethoven, with soprano soloist and male narrator.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
AUG 19 1964

Phyllis Curtin Sings to 1042 At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—It was cool at Tanglewood Tuesday evening and Phyllis Curtin, soprano, was in good voice.

Last Chamber Music

She sang 30 songs (plus encores) in the theater for the 1042 listeners who attended the last of the eight Tuesday night chamber music concerts. And she sang them very well, indeed.

They were presented in five groups, five from the 18th Century in the first group; six by Hugo Wolf in the second; three by Richard Strauss in the third, four each by Debussy and Faure in the fourth, and eight contemporary Latin songs in the fifth.

Miss Curtin's skill as a recitalist is such that it is difficult to say which group she was happiest with. All sounded as if she were singing without effort and with pleasure.

Her voice had plenty of power when needed and could be throttled down to float lightweight notes easily. And her control was immaculate.

She shifted tone colors neatly to fit the mood of the song, enunciated words with precision and hit the high, hard notes as if it were easy.

Dramatic Power

Her voice was bright with ringing, crystalline quality that lent it a dramatic power put to good use in those songs that were short and comical, such as Wolf's "Der Tambour' and Pergolesi's "Se Tu M'ami" and in those that were laden with emotion, such as Mozart's "Als Luise" (K520), Wolf's "Herr, des Knaben Augen" and Debussy's settings of poems by Paul Verlaine.

Best, perhaps, were Wolf's six Lieder and the four Verlaine poems presented as eight songs —each set to music by Debussy and Faure. But the "Three Songs of Ophelia' from "Hamlet" by Richard Strauss contained most all of the performing qualities exhibited in the other groups, including whimsy. It really was hard to choose. Miss Curtin is a versatile performer and gave a fine recital.

Herald NEW YORK Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 19 1964

Music Theater Movies TV Art

Music Review

Soprano Phyllis Curtin

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FINAL event in the Tuesday evening chamber music series at Tanglewood was a song recital last night. This preceding sentence is good for a coin to anyone who cares to bother to send it in to any of several periodicals which has a "slips in the press" column. Few in the enthusiastic audience, however, in the Theater-Concert Hall would quibble, no matter what the auspices, over the chance to hear soprano Phyllis Curtin and her piano accompanist, Ryan Edwards.

* * *

MISS CURTIN sang some Strauss songs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the great Shed two weeks ago. On that occasion the stunning might of her voice was used with impressive impact, necessarily, indeed, against the thick orchestration of Strauss. Last night, with the discreet and lambent pianism of Mr. Edwards, Miss Curtin could choose any nuance of the gamut her artistic sense might persuade.

Her program was a model of organization: a group of early Gluck, Pergolesi and Mozart; five of Hugo Wolf; the three Strauss songs of Ophelia from "Hamlet"; a remarkable group of four poems of Paul Verlaine set to music by both Faure and Debussy and sung in alternate juxtaposition; and a final group of contemporary Latin songs,

* * *

MISS CURTIN'S regal appearance and captivating smile predisposes anyone who might come determined to enjoy a song recital. She had a slight difficulty, to start, to bring her vast vocal resources down to the dimensions her musical sense guided her to use in the opening Italian arias, but in Mozart's "Als Luise die Briefe Verbrannte" she attained the peak — an elevation attainable by but few vocalists — of expressiveness and tonal beauty.

Her Wolf songs were exquisite. In "Herr, was traegt der Boden hier?" and "Nimmersatte Liebe" the texture of her voice and grasp of mood were complete if miniature masterpieces. In "Der Tambour" a delicious sense of humor and characterization appeared. By now she had disclosed the huge range of her magnificent voice from full-throated tone to the last phrase of "Du denkst mit einem Faedchen" where she uttered the final words with surd articulation.

* * *

THE IDEA of allowing an audience to hear how two masters of vocal writing would use the same poems was a capital one. Which one conveyed the Verlaine spirit more faithfully? That is not easy to decide, but if my reactions were at all typical, I could have listened to all eight again in Miss Curtin's poignant and graphic penetration.

AUG 12 1964

Tanglewood's Old Master's Night

By Eric Salzman

LENOX, Mass.

Last night was old master night at the Berkshire music center's current American music series.

Old masterpieces in this show run on to pieces like the Gunther Schuller string quartet written way back in prehistoric times like 1957, relatively recent works like the Leon Kirchner quartet of 1960 or the second string quartet of Elliot Carter and the Arthur Berger quartet of the years in between.

The occasion was a concert by the Lenox Quartet, alumni of these fair hills made good and now come back to pay their respects to their alma mater—and to some of the music which made them famous at the beginning of their career.

The Carter quartet was an especially fitting part of the program. The work was one of the ensemble's early triumphs and it stands at a kind of turning point in the development of recent American music. The influence of Carter's music, although not necessary obvious or overt, has been one of the key factors in the development of a rich new virtuoso music of great character, resource and expressive coherence and we've been hearing some of the remarkable latter-day results all this week.

The Carter is an authentic masterpiece of its kind, generating new ideas of form out of a very individual and imaginative use of the instruments and the medium. But the work should not overshadow the nearly contemporary Berger quartet which, in a very different way, achieves the same kind of poetic ends.

The Berger is built on shifting planes of texture and articulation line and attack, rhythm and tempo, motion and statis, always in and around the strong structural framework of a big expressive conception of the medium and the way it speaks. The Schuller, within a smaller formal frame, goes after many of the same ideas. It is even more explicitly built on a series of shifts from one color and texture to the next, open to semi-improvisation at one end, tightly fixed at another, pure pitch play at one moment, accent and color at another. The piece is brilliantly handled with all of Schuller's sureness of hand, medium and musical motion.

The Kirchner piece stands a little apart from the others. It is built on a Bartok-Stravinsky rhythmic sense plus a kind of linear and harmonic post-expression without benefit of clergy.

The Lenox are specialists in all this music and they play it to the manner born. Indeed, a difficult work like the Carter has become almost too easy for them and some of its essential dynamic distinctions and articulations that they used to project so well were lost in the grand motion. Aside from some such details, these were remarkably communicative performances, extraordinarily fluent and scaled to big line and shape.

Messrs. Carter and Berger in very different phases of their creative careers were represented earlier in the day at a concert given by students of the instrumental department of the center here. These young players—by no means contemporary specialists—gave creditable performances of the Berger wind quartet of 1941, the Carter quintet of 1948—two utterly delightful more or less neo-classical works—as well as the Irving Fine string quartet of 1953 and the recent Walter Piston piano quartet. There were some problems here and there—principally in indifferentiated articulations and dynamics—but it was remarkable to hear how much the youngest generation of musicians is growing up with the Twentieth Century music as a natural means of expression for them.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Record-American
M/E Circ. 441,810

AUG 21 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193

AUG 14 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Herald
Morn. Circ. 176,483

AUG 14 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711

AUG 19 1964

Bach Concert At Tanglewood

The final program in the series, the Music of J. S. Bach, will be given at Tanglewood Sunday morning at 10. Performers will be members of the Berkshire Music Center, Summer center for the advance study of music, maintained by the Boston Symphony.

The concert will offer the Trio Sonata, "Super Herr Jesu Christ Dich Zu Uns Wendt," and the Trio Sonata from "Musical Offering." The program also includes Cantatas No. 202, "Weichet nur, betruebten Schatten," No. 82, 'Ich habe genug," and No. 118, "O Jesu Christ mein's Lebens Licht."

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193

AUG 20 1964
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711

AUG 20 1964

Burgin to Lead Final Student Orchestra Event

LENOX — The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will give its last concert of the season Saturday afternoon at 3:30 in the Theater at Tanglewood. This is one of over 40 events that have been open to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center this season.

Richard Burgin, head of the Music Center's department of instrumental music, will conduct Saturday. The program will consist of the Symphony No. 1 by Sibelius; Copland's Short Symphony (No. 3); and the Overture and Incidental Music to "Egmont" (complete) by Beethoven, with soprano soloist and male narrator.

Before the concert, beginning at 2:30, Henry Portnoi of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth in his series of lectures which precede each Music Center Orchestra concert, in the Chamber Music Hall. Using examples from the music to be programmed, Portnoi offers the opportunity to better appreciate the performance.

The lecture and concert will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, those who make a contribution to the support of the Center. Contributions may be made in person at the Friends office at the main gate of Tanglewood, or by mail to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711

AUG 25 1964

Berkshire Music Center

Student Players Glow Under Burgin Baton

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX — Last Saturday at Tanglewood was more than anything the day of Leinsdorf's performance of Verdi's Requiem, but still that afternoon I had heard one of the most exciting orchestral concerts of the season.

It was the final one in the series by the student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center, conducted this time by Richard Burgin.

The program, an uncommonly interesting one in itself, consisted of the Symphony No. 1 by Sibelius, Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theatre," and most of Beethoven's incidental music for Goethe's "Egmont."

Burgin had conducted the first concert this Summer by the B.M.C. orchestra, but that was one I had to miss. This encounter of conductor and orchestra was especially interesting, because I had earlier heard the orchestra under two other conductors — Erich Leinsdorf and Max Rudolf — and just recently Mr. Burgin had led one of the Boston Symphony's concerts. From every point of view this occasion was a singularly satisfactory one.

The orchestra consists of about 70 students, some of unusually brilliant promise; some indubitably just routine. It is assembled for two months, and it has no time to form a personality or habits of its own. Under Leinsdorf it played as a sort of junior Boston Symphony—lean, nervous, a little taut. It was impressive especially in the virtuosic Stravinsky "Pulcinella"; it was a tremendous shock to hear the same group play in so raucous and slipshod a manner for Mr. Rudolph a couple of weeks later.

Under Burgin, they seemed even to outplay their own potential. When the associate conductor leads a great orchestra, the men are apt to regard the occasion as a sort of holiday, and they don't bother much. But when Richard Burginstands before a group of students, that is quite another thing.

He is a superb trainer, a great teacher. Under his skillful guidance, enthusiastic urging and tactful restrain, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra played wonderfully. The string tone had roundness and warmth, the wind playing had thrust as well as refinement when needed, and the performance as a whole had a kind of involvement and commitment.

In most respects, all the music was very well done. In the Seb Sibielus, Burgin now and again substituted a flat idea of his own for a striking one of the composer, for instance, by modifying accents through alterations of bowings, or by the surpression of a caesura; but on the whole the interpretation was as powerful as any I have heard.

Copland's Suite is a very effective example of his early Americana, and it was done with real zest. I remember with special pleasure the easy and idiomatic playing of the trumpet fanfares in the prologue and E flat clarinet solos in the dance.

Beethoven's overture for Egmont is well known, but the rest of the music, which is hardly ever heard, is on an equally high level.

There is a problem about how to present it effectively in concert. Generally, and on this occasion, some sort of connecting narration is used. This one, except for the few lines written by Goethe, was unfortunate in its diction and even more so in its delivery.

When Beethoven was allowed to take over, things got exciting. I wish Mr. Burgin had given more of the music. He left out the Entr' actes before the Second and Fifth Acts altogether, and what was worse, made bad cuts in the interlude before Act Three and in the final melodrama, killing some of Beethoven's best inspiration.

As much as he allowed to stand, he conducted extremely well.

Particular credit should go to the soprano, Kate Hurney, for her musicianly and communicative singing of Klaerchen's two songs.

POPS CONCERT

133

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

JUL 25 1964

SUMMER NOCTURNE involved more than 13,000 people at pops concert Wednesday at Tanglewood. The night was warm and fun was had by all.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Saturday, July 11, 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912

JUL 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
FRAMINGHAM, Mass.
Circ. 14,497

JUL 11 1964

Allan Sherman At Tanglewood

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, has invited Allan Sherman to appear at the annual Boston Pops at Tanglewood concert on July 22. The brilliant folk singer who makes a specialty of parodies will be making his first appearance with the Pops Orchestra and also at Tanglewood. Mr. Sherman delighted the parents of all young campers with his rendition of "Hello Muddah-Hello Fadduh" and has made a number of other recordings, including "Allan in Wonderland" and "My Son the Nut" which have skyrocketed him to fame in the entertainment world.

TIMES-UNION * Albany, Wed., July 22, 1964 19

Allan Sherman, musical parodist, right, explains to Arthur Fiedler, conductor of Boston Pops, a high point in score which he has had arranged for their first joint appearance in Pops program at the Berkshire Music Festival in Lenox, Mass. tonight. Mr. Sherman will narrate the pice titled "Peter and the Cowboy."

UPI Telephoto

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304

JUL 20 1964

ROTUND COMEDIAN Allan Sherman will give his satiric treatment to orchestral classics at the annual Pops program at Tanglewood next Wednesday night.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal
LAKEVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 3,132

JUL 16 1964

Boston Pops Concert At Tanglewood July 22

The annual Tanglewood concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra will take place Wednesday, July 22 at 8 p.m. in the 6000-seat Mu- tickets to the lawns will not be sold in advance, but will be available two hours before concert time.

This will mark Srthur Fiedler's 11th annual visit to Tanglewood to conduct a Boston Pops concert. He is celebrating his 35th year as conductor of the Pops.

Spring Repeat 8/12/64

Pops Recorded

RCA-Victor Records recorded live Allan Sherman's concert appearance with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra at Tanglewood July 22.

Announcement was made by Roger Hall, RCA Victor record division manager of Red Seal artists and repertoire, who said "This promises to be one of the most provocative 'cultural' events ever set down on a recording." Fall release is scheduled.

The material performed by Sherman was conceived by him and the caricatures contained in the musical scores were arranged according to his personal instruction and inspiration.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 48,932

JUL 9 1964

Pops At Tanglewood

Arthur Fiedler, with or without the Beatle wig he lately dons for "I Want to Hold Your Hand," will journey to Tanglewood with his Boston Pops Orchestra for a one-night stand July 22 at 8 p.m. Tickets for the annual Pops visit are on sale at the Tanglewood box office, except for general admissions, which aren't released for sale until two hours prior to beton-raising.

134

MUSIC BUSINESS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
E. O. WEEK - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 25 1964

Allan Sherman, that inveterate authority on summer camps, will check in this Wednesday at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home, Tanglewood. This time, however, the "Hello, Muddah" man will seek new fodder. He'll make his debut that night (22) as conductor, of the Boston Pops Orchestra in a "Theme and Variations on 'How Dry I Am'." Thereafter he will perform an up-dated version of Prokofiev's children - of - all - ages classic, "Peter and the Wolf" entitled "Peter and the Commissar." Sherman, of course, has done his own libretto for the affair, which will be waxed for posterity by RCA Victor Records. This could cause a slight bit of release embarrassment for Victor, since we recall there was to be another recording of "Peter and the Wolf" recorded this summer with Van Cliburn and one of the Johnson girls.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240

JUL 20 1964

Performance Wednesday

Program for Tanglewood Pops Concert Announced

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, has announced the complete program for the Pops concert at Tanglewood, Lenox, Wednesday evening at 8.

Friday's Concert

The Pops maestro's annual appearance at Tanglewood will be for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

For this concert M.R Fiedler has invited the folk parodist Allan Sherman to be his guest.

The concert will begin with Strauss' Radetzky March which will be followed by the Overture to "La Belle Helene" by Offenbach. Mr. Fiedler and the Pops Orchestra will then be joined by Sherman, of "Hello Muddah, Hello Faddh" fame, for the comic's arrangement of "Peter and the Commissar" with apologies to S. Prokofiev, L. V. Beethoven, J. L. F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, J. Strauss II, P. I. Tchaikovsky, and G. Verdi.

"Sound of Music"

After intermission Mr. Fiedler will conduct Selections from "The Sound of Music," a popular favorite with Boston Pops audiences this spring. Sherman then will take the podium to conduct his arrangement of Variations on the Theme "How Dry I Am" and then be heard with the orchestra in a performance of a Sherman arrangement of "The End of a Symphony." The program will close with two well-known Fiedler favorites "Hello, Dolly" by Herman, and Sousa's "The Stars and Stripes Forever." The arrangement of "Hello, Dolly" was a hit on the Boston Pops programs this season at Symphony Hall and has been recorded for RCA Victor by the Pops Orchestra on a 45 rpm record backed by "I Wanna Hold Your Hand." RCA Victor will record the Pops concert at Tanglewood including Allan Sherman's selections. The recording will be made live during the performance.

An unlimited number of general admission tickets for the Boston Pops at Tanglewood concert will go on sale at the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood at 4 p.m. Wednesday afternoon. The grounds will open at that hour and all ticket holders have been invited to take picnic suppers to Tanglewood. The Tanglewood cafeteria will have box suppers available for those who wish to purchase them.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 441,810

JUL 8 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304

JUL 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586

JUL 5 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 128,545

JUL 7 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times
NEW MILFORD, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 4,096

JUL 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240

JUL 2

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111

JUL 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News
WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 1,200

JUL 9 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

JUL 4 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,439

JUL 8 1964

Boston Pops Appears At Tanglewood July 22

Tickets for the annual Tanglewood concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra went on sale at the Tanglewood Box Office Monday morning. The concert will take place Wednesday evening, July 22, at 8 p.m. in the 6,000-seat Music Shed. General admission tickets to the lawns will not be sold in advance but will be available two hours before concert time.

This will mark Arthur Fiedler's eleventh annual visit to Tanglewood to coduct a Boston Pops concert. He is celebrating his 35th year as conductor of the Pops. Proceeds from the sale of tickets will go to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Institution.

AROUND THE TOWN

The Boston 'Pops' Plays Tonight at Tanglewood

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

The late Walter Damrosch, distinguished orchestra conductor and musicologist, said a mouthful when he told one of his children's radio music appreciation audiences that "Popular music is merely familiar music." His contention will be strengthened tonight when it is expected that some 15,000 popular music lovers will converge on the beautiful Tanglewood Estate to pay homage to Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra, making their annual pilgrimage to the Berkshires. The program runs the gamut from classical music to "Hello Muddah, Hello, Faddah" sung by guest artist Allan Sherman, the American folk singer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, minus the first chair men and women, is the nucleus of the Pops, and the ensemble which makes the Pops records. Their program is a sneaky way of indoctrinating the Hoi Polloi into the mysteries of "The Three Bs," since the audience should leave the concert huming "Hello Dolly" or the television commercials. When the handsome, virle conductor starts to play Sousa's theme song "The Stars and Stripes Forever," you will know that the concert is over.

The lawns of Tanglewood are Kelly green and as smooth as the cloth on a billard table. The caretaker keeps the sward moist and vigorous with the plentiful use, it is presumed, of the water from Lake Mahkeenac, or the Stockbridge Bowl, as it is referred to by those not versed in Indian lore. There is just one discordant note which disturbs the harmony of the elysian scene, and that is the carelessness of the litter bugs who strew the lawns with the remnants of their basket or box lunches, in spite of the fact that large receptacles are placed at nearby points for the garbage disposal. But before the concert of the next day rolls around, the lawns are restored to their pristine beauty by the Tanglewood sanitary squad.

In the earlier days of the Berkshire Festival, the conductor and the members of the orchestra were plagued with dive-bombing bugs, attracted by the overhead lights. This situation, disturbing to the players, has been remedied with the use of some potent insect repellent. Even mosquitos are conspicuous by their absence. During these hot, humid days and nights, Mr. Leinsdorf has allowed the members of his orchestra to shed their white coats, a situation which is reflected in the sports attire affected by many men and women in the vast audience. Smoking is permitted in the shed. However, I should like to see signs placed in strategic places, barring the use of pipes, burning tobacco which smells as if it had been salvaged from the office pencil sharpener.

On the positive side of the picture is the great number of children.

Boys and girls with their parents and members of adjacent summer camps exhibit exemplary conduct and strict attention to the music being played in one of the most heartening aspects of the concerts. They are the future patrons of Tanglewood.

Every reserved seat for tonight's concert has been sold for the past week. However, those who were unable to obtain seats in the Big Shed (which seats 6,000) can enjoy the concerts Al Fresco, as a result of the perfect acoustics which obta Tanglewood, if not in Lincoln Center. Bring along some ets to spread on the lawns, and some folding chairs, an "Music Under the Stars."

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

JUL 27 1964

Murdah! Murdah!

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Bravo to Andrew Clarke for his review [July 23] of Allen Sherman's farce during the Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood. The farce was Allen Sherman and not his jokes.

I, too, was disappointed and annoyed that anyone who appeals to a minority could be presented to us as the major attraction and yet get billing before the concert as simply a minor guest star. I was prepared to suffer for some 30 minutes, but I'm positive the net result was something that appeared to be longer than "Ben Hur."

If I sound bitter maybe it's because I don't like to spend $4.50 to have the honor of supplying a part of the background noise for RCA Victor records. They have enough canned laughter of their own, and if they should ever need more they can always borrow from TV.

EDWARD M. COMSTOCK.
Housatonic.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106

SPRINGFIELD,
Union
Morn. Circ.

JUL 23 196

Sherman
Pension Fu
Hub Orche

By R. C. HAM

LENOX — The ro
an Allan Sherman,
"My son, the folk s founder of Camp Gr
spired with Arthur
the Boston Pops O
entice $39,652 into tra's pension fund entranced listeners
wood Wednesday nig

Short Show

Picnickers started grounds in bright su
the orchestra stopp ing and gates were 4.20.

They brought bl
camp chairs and be las, which came i long after when a s fell from clouds tha ered during suppe didn't rain again.

Fielder marched 8.10 and without launched a quick
"Radetzky March"
one of the waltzing
Vienna.

Rest to She

Then he led the the sort of music chestra is famous over, a prancing overture to "La Be

The preliminaries the rest of the even nearly completely t man.

Interrupted only and the intermissio in the world's first es of the following (Also by Sherman) like a polite night an, the narration and the Commissar
a piano solo, for "
How Dry I Am"
tary with an arran
"The End of a Sy more pieces by
"Hello, Dolly," an Stripes Forever," ular program, whi audience demande won four encores
rry. With the Fri
"Mack the Knife"
na Hold Your H which the orches chanted "Yeah, Y

Modest On e encore ende

h wasn't reall was more like a Sherman, the dest and self-effa
ge. His manner
ost apologetic.
f his way to mak
ne knew that he ouldn't read music
onduct an orchest
But he didn't sa ll jokes. It is a n great abundanc
"Peter and the C piece modeled
Peter and the W
he same kind of story and, in fa
f the same melo
s quite different
Audience Nearly
It is about a who writes a pie which the comm cept for publicist
ish disc jockeys
ous. The perform corded and A ockeys may ma t has the big chestra playing
Bossa Nova, cha nd roll, blues
he audience wa
whelmed.
The other co
Sherman were n
ful. His "Variati Am," for in orchestra playin une in many g waltz time.
Most inte
perhaps, appe man played th side down on way it come he first phra ovefest melo
"My Heart at reme Saint nd Delilah."
Nothing
"The End was a co le tunes
Haircut, ice Doctor neatly att massive,
amous

134

MUSIC BUSINESS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
E. O. WEEK - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 25 1964

Allan Sherman, that inveterate authority on summer camps, will check in this Wednesday at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home, Tanglewood. This time, however, the "Hello, Muddah" man will seek new fodder. He'll make his debut that night (22) as conductor, of the Boston Pops Orchestra in a "Theme and Variations on 'How Dry I Am'." Thereafter he will perform an up-dated version of Prokoflev's children - of - all - ages classic, "Peter and the Wolf" entitled "Peter and the Commissar." Sherman, of course, has done his own libretto for the affair, which will be waxed for posterity by RCA Victor Records. This could cause a slight bit of release embarrassment for Victor, since we recall there was to be another recording of "Peter and the Wolf" recorded this summer with Van Cliburn and one of the Johnson girls.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUL 20 1964

Performance Wednesday

Program for Tanglewood Pops Concert Announced

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, has announced the complete program for the Pops concert at Tanglewood, Lenox, Wednesday evening at 8.

Friday's Concert

The Pops maestro's annual appearance at Tanglewood will be for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

For this concert M.R Fiedler has invited the folk parodist Allan Sherman to be his guest.

The concert will begin with Strauss' Radetzky March which will be followed by the Overture to "La Belle Helene" by Offenbach. Mr. Fiedler and the Pops Orchestra will then be joined by Sherman, of "Hello Muddah, Hello Faddh" fame, for the comic's arrangement of "Peter and the Commissar" with apologies to S. Prokofiev, L. V. Beethoven, J. L. F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, J. Strauss II, P. I. Tchaikovsky, and G. Verdi.

"Sound of Music"

After intermission Mr. Fiedler will conduct Selections from "The Sound of Music," a popular favorite with Boston Pops audiences this spring. Sherman then will take the podium to conduct his arrangement of Variations on the Theme "How Dry I Am" and then be heard with the orchestra in a performance of a Sherman arrangement of "The End of a Symphony." The program will close with two well-known Fiedler favorites "Hello Dolly" by Herman, and Sousa's "The Stars and Stripes Forever." The arrangement of "Hello, Dolly" was a hit on the Boston Pops programs this season at Symphony Hall and has been recorded for RCA Victor by the Pops Orchestra on a 45 rpm record backed by "I Wanna Hold Your Hand." RCA Victor will record the Pops concert at Tanglewood including Allan Sherman's selections. The recording will be made live during the performance.

An unlimited number of general admission tickets for the Boston Pops at Tanglewood concert will go on sale at the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood at 4 p.m. Wednesday afternoon. The grounds will open at that hour and all ticket holders have been invited to take picnic suppers to Tanglewood. The Tanglewood cafeteria will have box suppers available for those who wish to purchase them.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 441,810
JUL 8 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUL 2 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586
JUL 5 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 128,545
JUL 7 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times
NEW MILFORD, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 4,096
JUL 2 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
JUL 2 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111
JUL 10 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News
WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 1,200
JUL 9 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JUL 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,439
JUL 8 1964

Boston Pops Appears At Tanglewood July 22

Tickets for the annual Tanglewood concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra went on sale at the Tanglewood Box Office Monday morning. The concert will take place Wednesday evening, July 22, at 8 p.m. in the 6,000-seat Music Shed. General admission tickets to the lawns will not be sold in advance but will be available two hours before concert time.

This will mark Arthur Fiedler's eleventh annual visit to Tanglewood to coduct a Boston Pops concert. He is celebrating his 35th year as conductor of the Pops. Proceeds from the sale of tickets will go to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Institution.

AROUND THE TOWN

Albany Times-Union 7/22/64

The Boston 'Pops' Plays Tonight at Tanglewood

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

The late Walter Damrosch, distinguished orchestra conductor and musicologist, said a mouthful when he told one of his children's radio music appreciation audiences that "Popular music is merely familiar music." His contention will be strengthened tonight when it is expected that some 15,000 popular music lovers will converge on the beautiful Tanglewood Estate to pay homage to Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra, making their annual pilgrimage to the Berkshires. The program runs the gamut from classical music to "Hello Muddah, Hello, Faddah" sung by guest artist Allan Sherman, the American folk singer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, minus the first chair men and women, is the nucleus of the Pops, and the ensemble which makes the Pops records. Their program is a sneaky way of indoctrinating the Hoi Polloi into the mysteries of "The Three Bs," since the audience should leave the concert humming "Hello Dolly" or the television commercials. When the handsome, virile conductor starts to play Sousa's theme song "The Stars and Stripes Forever," you will know that the concert is over.

The lawns of Tanglewood are Kelly green and as smooth as the cloth on a billard table. The caretaker keeps the sward moist and vigorous with the plentiful use, it is presumed, of the water from Lake Mahkeenac, or the Stockbridge Bowl, as it is referred to by those not versed in Indian lore. There is just one discordant note which disturbs the harmony of the elysian scene, and that is the carelessness of the litter bugs who strew the lawns with the remnants of their basket or box lunches, in spite of the fact that large receptacles are placed at nearby points for the garbage disposal. But before the concert of the next day rolls around, the lawns are restored to their pristine beauty by the Tanglewood sanitary squad.

In the earlier days of the Berkshire Festival, the conductor and the members of the orchestra were plagued with dive-bombing bugs, attracted by the overhead lights. This situation, disturbing to the players, has been remedied with the use of some potent insect repellent. Even mosquitos are conspicuous by their absence. During these hot, humid days and nights, Mr. Leinsdorf has allowed the members of his orchestra to shed their white coats, a situation which is reflected in the sports attire affected by many men and women in the vast audience. Smoking is permitted in the shed. However, I should like to see signs placed in strategic places, barring the use of pipes, burning tobacco which smells as if it had been salvaged from the office pencil sharpener.

On the positive side of the picture is the great number of children.

Boys and girls with their parents and members of adjacent summer camps exhibit exemplary conduct and strict attention to the music being played in one of the most heartening aspects of the concerts. They are the future patrons of Tanglewood.

Every reserved seat for tonight's concert has been sold for the past week. However, those who were unable to obtain seats in the Big Shed (which seats 6,000) can enjoy the concerts Al Fresco, as a result of the perfect acoustics which obta[in] Tanglewood, if not in Lincoln Center. Bring along some [blan]kets to spread on the lawns, and some folding chairs, an[d] "Music Under the Stars."

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304
JUL 27 1964

Murdah! Murdah!

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Bravo to Andrew Clarke for his review [July 23] of Allen Sherman's farce during the Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood. The farce was Allen Sherman and not his jokes.

I, too, was disappointed and annoyed that anyone who appeals to a minority could be presented to us as the major attraction and yet get billing before the concert as simply a minor guest star. I was prepared to suffer for some 30 minutes, but I'm positive the net result was something that appeared to be longer than "Ben Hur."

If I sound bitter maybe it's because I don't like to spend $4.50 to have the honor of supplying a part of the background noise for RCA Victor records. They have enough canned laughter of their own, and if they should ever need more they can always borrow from TV.

EDWARD M. COMSTOCK.
Housatonic.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,19

JUL 23 1964

Sherman Hikes Pension Fund of Hub Orchestra

By R. C. HAMMERICH

ON ... The sound comedy Allan Sherman, father of ... son, the folk singer" and ... of Camp Granada, con... with Arthur Fiedler and ... Boston Pops Orchestra ... $39,652 into the or... pension fund from 13,327 ... listeners at Tangle... Wednesday night.

Short Shower

... started entering the ... grounds in bright sunshine when ... orchestra stopped rehears... and gates were opened at ...

... brought blankets and ... chairs and beach umbrel... which came in handy not ... after when a short shower ... from clouds that had gath... during supper time. It ... again.

... marched into view at ... and without preliminary ... launched a quick and crisp ... Radetzky March" written by ... of the waltzing Strausses of ...

Rest to Sherman

... he led the orchestra in ... sort of music his Pops Or... is famous for the world ... a prancing Offenbach ... ture to "La Belle Helene." ... preliminaries completed, ... st of the evening belonged ... completely to Allan Sher...

... upted only by applause ... intermission, he started ... world's first performance ... following inventions: ... German) A monologue ... night club comedi... ... tion for "Peter ... conducting ... variations on ... Bach" and commen... ...angement called ... Symphony." Two ... the orchestra, ... Dolly," and "Stars and ... Forever" ended the reg... program, but the cheering ... demanded more. They ... encores, "Java," "Sur... Fringe on Top," ... Knife" and "I Wan... Your Hand" (during ... orchestra members ... Yeah, Yeah.")

Modest On Stage

... encores ended a concert ... wasn't really a concert, ... was more like a giant "act." ... Sherman, the star, was a ... dest and self-effacing man on ... age. His manner was mild, al... most apologetic. He went out ... his way to make sure every... one knew that he couldn't sing, ... couldn't read music and couldn't ... conduct an orchestra.

But he didn't say he couldn't tell jokes. It is a talent he has in great abundance.

"Peter and the Commissar" is a piece modeled on Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf." It uses the same kind of method to tell a story and, in fact, uses some of the same melodies. The story is quite different. It's funny.

Audience Nearly Overwhelmed

It is about a small Russian ... writes a pretty little song ... the commissar won't ac... for publication. The Rus... disc jockeys make it fam... The performance was re... and American disc ... may make it famous, ... has the big (102-men) or... playing wrong notes, ... Nova, cha cha cha, rock ... roll, blues and dixieland. ... audience was nearly over... whelmed.

The other contributions by Sherman were nearly as success... His "Variations on How Dry I Am," for instance, had the orchestra playing the familiar ... in many guises, including ... time.

Most interesting variation, perhaps, appeared when Sher... played the first phrase ... side down on the piano. That ... it comes out the same as ... first phrase of one of the ... melodies in opera — ... My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice" ... Saint Saens' "Samson ... Delilah."

Nothing but Applause

"The End of a Symphony" ... a collection of simple lit... tunes like "Shave and a ... Haircut, Two Bits" and "Yan... Doodle" to which Sherman ... attached big, pompous, ... massive, chordal endings from ... famous symphonies.

The comparisons were comical, especially when razzed with Sherman's special skill for parody.

Before the performance a couple of misgivings were overheard, like what can Sherman do with a symphony orchestra?

There was nothing but happy applause afterward.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499

JUL 24 1964

Pops Concert Attracts Big Tanglewood Crowd

Intermittent thunderstorms only served to whet the enthusiasm of the 12,627 men, women and children who swarmed over the ample Tanglewood lawns and filled the big shed to hear Arthur Fiedler give his annual Boston Pops concert, with the assistance of Allan Sherman, guest artist. As a result, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund received the sum of $39,652.

Starting almost a half hour late, Mr. Fiedler, dapper in a gray jacket topping black slacks, and his white-shirted orchestra members plunged into a crisp performance of Richard Strauss' Radetzky March, while people were still wandering to their seats. Offenbach's delightful Overture from "La Belle Helene" followed, fluid and gracious, with a rousing climax which produced a like reaction in the audience's applause.

Blowing kisses to the audience, comedian Allan Sherman then walked onstage with Mr. Fiedler. Taking over the mike, he announced that they would be cutting a new album with this performance of his works, urging the people to applaud when they felt like it, "be natural, but not too natural," thanking this "fantastic orchestra" for putting up with him, explaining that he actually looked like Cary Grant, but his advisers decided that he should be "short, fat, and wear glasses for the month of July"—that as a hobby he composed songs for friends and guests at his home—and had "written" many classics, that he had laryngitis, which would probably help his singing—in this piece he had changed the original story, the words, and then the music, and called it "Peter and the Commissar," with apologies to Beethoven, Prokofiev, Brahms, Strauss II, Tschaikovsky, Verdi and Mozart.

Using an Ogden Nash style, which made most of the audience smile, and some laugh outright, Mr. Sherman narrated an amusing story of Peter, a Russian composer, and his difficulties with the Commissar and his committee, turning the charming and evocative music of Prokofiev into a heart-rending shambles. Loving every minute, he changed Beethoven's Fifth into a cha-cha-cha, Brahm's Lullaby to rock 'n' roll, Swan Lake into a blues number with a hot trombone.

The Grand March from Aida became Dixieland, etc., Peter's theme returned, he was "discovered" by a lil old man from a recording company and elevated to the Vladivostok Parade, an infinitum. The applause was deafening!

After intermission, the incomparable and accommodating orchestra was whisked through a medley of selections from Rodgers' "The Sound of Music" by the knowledgeable Mr. Fiedler.

Confessing that he knew nothing about conducting, Mr. Fiedler had been trying valiantly but in vain, to teach him since Monday; that it was immensely presumptive of him to stand before this marvelous orchestra, but the saving grace was that they knew what they were doing; since he couldn't read a note of music, he did have a sign on the conductor's sign which read "try not to make an —of yourself," he would play a piano solo for this piece if they hadn't taken away the pieces of red scotch tape affixed to the proper keys; that he had composed these "Variations on How Dry I am" in an airplane in his head, because "all composers drink," and given it to his arrangers, Mr. Sherman launched into a cleverly conceived, (although it's been done before, but not on such a grand scale) illustration of the theme's presence, in one form or another, in classic and popular numbers. Allan did have to make a second start, since, as he turned around and smiled, "I zigged where I should have zagged!"

"The End of a Symphony" was just what the name implies, a parody on several composers' overlong endings, interspersed with Sherman's couplets. "Let's take Beethoven's Fifth and Yankee Doodle, and make them into a symphonic strudel." Schubert took so long to end his seventh, his eighth remained unfinished, etc. His encore was of course "Hello modda, hello fadda," everyone loving it as much as he.

After "Hello, Dolly," Mr. Fiedler closed the program with his always stirring interpretation of Stars and Stripes Forever, extending several encores for the delight of a well-pleased audience. M.deB.B.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

WORCESTER, MASS.
Telegram
Morn. Circ. 58,744

JUL 23 1964

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Funny man and alleged singer Allan Sherman took over the Boston Pops—Arthur Fiedler program last night at Tanglewood. It was the annual "Pops" benefit for the Berkshire Music Center. Proceeds of $39,652. Came from an audience of 12,627.

Sherman was given a lot to do. Some of it was unique in that his new opus, "Peter and the Commissar," was recorded last night on stage. Sherman was noticeably nervous and several lines had to be repeated, but he had warned the audience in advance that it might happen.

The orchestra and Fiedler managed to have some of the program all to themselves.

They got off to a booming start with Strauss' "Radetzky-march." Fiedler quieted the orchestra for the liltring mid-section, but it was inevitable (and fortunate) that they return to the "hoop-la" for a big close.

More Finesse

There was more finesse in Offenbach's "Beautiful Helen" Overture. Woodwind and string solos made beautiful sound, and provided a few moments for quiet meditation. The lush waltz was tuneful and suave. In the fast-moving sections, all were not neck-and-neck. — For example, the can-can — but vitality wasn't much dimmed.

Format of Sherman's loan of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" was the dictatorial protest of Peter's tune when he brought it before the commissar.

Sherman's entrance on stage (throwing kisses) was enough to strike an informal mood.

After trying out the sound system: "Can you hear me?"

A loud "no" from the audience.

"Then how can you answer if you can't hear? Mr. Fiedler suggests that you move down closer (every seat was taken) and pay the difference."

After a fairly straight playing of the "Peter" theme, it was given the business. The commissars wanted the theme changed. First a bossa nova. What cats! Then other composers and their sacred themes were brought into the mess.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was converted into "cha-cha-cha." Brahms' Lullaby went rock n' rolling. Slices were taken out of Pete Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake" and turned into a blues. Verdi's "Aida" march went Dixieland. And the audience went slightly wild.

Later on, Sherman took it upon himself to conduct the orchestra. He told the audience quite frankly that he didn't know how. And he proved it. For the record, the "score" he used was a piece of paper upon which was written "try not to make an ass of yourself."

Anyhow, the masterpiece was variations on "How Dry I Am." Sherman took his precipitous place on the podium and rapped loudly for attention. "You have no idea what an insane sense of power this gives, he remarked.

Thrust Per Note

His conducting was on thrust per note. Fiedler was one of the performers, sitting near the concertmaster. When the baton was pointed at him, he hicupped.

From that point, the orchestra gave the lead and Sherman set his zig-zagging to their speeds. But listening, he also knew where to look and cue.

The material was plentiful, and "How Dry" got constantly mixed up with other tunes. Lehar's "Merry Widow" waltz had its share, "The Man on the Flying Trapeze," the sobbing finale from Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony, and the "1812 Overture."

Massive Medley

So that the symphonic slapstick would be complete, Sherman also did a bit called "End of a Symphony," and his well-known version of "Hello Dolly."

Fiedler and the boys came through with a massive medley from "Sound of Music." The theme song was crammed with delirious sound. From there, it moved through a parade of contrasts — instrumentally-yodelled "Goatherd," sensuous "Favorite Things," piquant "Sixteen Going on Seventeen." The windup was a gliding "Edelweiss," and the tonal glow was brightest for "Climb Every Mountain."

Sense will be revived at Tanglewood tomorrow night when the Berkshire Music Festival begins its fourth weekend. Ormandy will guest conduct the Boston Symphony in Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, Debussy's "Iberia" and the second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite by Ravel.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

JUL 23 1964

Sherman Pops at Tanglewood

By ANDREW CLARKE

LAST NIGHT at Tanglewood the fare was guest artist Allan Sherman, assisted by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra. Regretfully, the roles were reversed, but perhaps the program director felt that the Boston Pops has become so old hat that something drastic had to be done.

And it was done. Mrs. Sherman's son was on the stage for a good half of the program, experimenting with his newly discovered talents as a composer and a teller of Tanglewood Tales. I personally had gone to hear the orchestra perform some of their delightful renditions of Broadway music and light classics, and what little I did hear was up to the Boston Pops' usual standard of excellence.

* * *

RCA VICTOR Records, however, had decided that last evening would be an auspicious time to make a live recording of Mr. Sherman's "Peter and the Commissar," a mildly amusing parody of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," that dragged on for a half hour. And then to round out the evening the audience was treated after intermission to the taping of side two of what will probably be a surefire best-seller, variations on "How Dry I Am" (this one conducted by her son himself) and "The End of a Symphony." Well, I want to tell you that I've already ordered 10 copies in advance so that the kids on my block can all have frisbies to play with next year.

* * *

ACTUALLY, Allan Sherman wasn't all that indigestible. He did deliver some funny lines ("Can you all hear me" — no — then how can you answer no if you can't hear me?"), and some of the parodies were great fun (Peter's theme in bossa nova rhythm, Beethoven's Fifth as a cha - cha, Brahms' "Lullaby" with a rock-and-roll beat, the "Swan Lake Blues," etc.). But somehow Mr. Sherman doesn't measure up to Danny Kaye as a comic conductor, and his material was both labored and spotty.

My biggest complaint was that the whole thing was overdone. Allan Sherman's forte is his "folk-singing," and for my money his best effort of the evening was his rendition of "Hello Muddah," which the audience insisted upon as an encore. He should stick to this idiom.

Whitestone

Mr. Sherman likes it quiet

* * *

THE ORCHESTRA opened the program with a stirring performance of Strauss' "Radetsky March," which was followed by an artful reading of Offenbach's "Overture to 'La Belle Helene,'" After intermission they played highlights from "The Sound of Music," a rousing version of "Hello Dolly," and closed the program with the perennial favorite, "Stars and Stripes Forever."

Encores included "Surrey With the Fringe on Top," "Mack the Knife" (featuring the big band sound of the Boston brass), and of course the Beatles' big hit, "I Want To Hold Your Hand," accompanied by the earsplitting screams of several thousand campers from around the area.

* * *

A CROWD of 13,327 jammed the shed and overflowed onto the lawn, and $39,652 was realized for the Orchestra's pension fund, a record for the Pops. This marked the first time that the proceeds had not gone to the Music Center. Last year the fund paid $210,000 to 92 pensioners and widows.

The weather, except for the humidity, was ideal and the huge crowd obviously enjoyed what they saw and heard. In all fairness it must be noted that Allan Sherman was very well received, but one would hope that next year's guest artist will not be allowed to monopolize the program to such an extent.

136

GALA EVENING

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 47,164

JUL 21 1964

'Gala Evening' Tickets Go On Sale Friday

Tickets go on sale this Friday for the "gala evening" at Tanglewood. The evening is a kind of annual classical hootenany, and it happens Wednesday, Aug. 19.

After a full afternoon of chamber music and recitals offered by all departments of the center, Erich Leinsdorf and Leopold Stokowski herd the Boston Symphony and all the Berkshire Music Center's student orchestras into the music shed at 8 p.m. There, the massive orchestra, 170 strong, and a 200 voice chorus thunder out a still-unannounced program.

Tickets for it will be available at the Tanglewood box office, except for general admissions, which aren't released until the afternoon of the concert.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711

JUL 27 1964

Giant Orchestra, Chorus To Fete Music Center

An orchestra of 170 players and a chorus of 200 will be on the Tanglewood stage Aug. 19 for a gala evening concert to benefit the Berkshire Music Center.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the 200 men's voices in the original version of Strauss' "Blue Danube" Waltzes and the March from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser."

The purely instrumental part of the program, at 8 p.m. in the 6000-seat Music Shed, will be played by the combined forces of the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestras. Leinsdorf will conduct Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 and Leopold Stokowski, in his first Tanglewood appearance this Summer, will direct his orchestration of a Bach-Passacaglia and Fugue.

The Aug. 19 concert will be the first time, since the founding of the music center in 1940, that the two orchestras have been formed into one ensemble for a complete program. The day's festivities will begin at 4 p.m. with a series of concerts by the 260 members of the music center who will be completing their eight weeks of study at Tanglewood on Aug. 22.

The Gala Evening performances are for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center, the Summer institution maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the advanced study of music. The music center is the only such academy operated by a major symphony orchestra, and the performances through the eight-week session by its participants and the Gala Evening are a major source of funds for the scholarship aid granted to many of these young musicians.

Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384
JUL 24 1964

The annual Tanglewood Gala on Aug. 19 will feature 170 instrumentalists and 200 choristers in such items as the Strauss "Blue Danube" Waltzes and the march from Wagner's "Tannhaueser" in the original versions with voices.

The orchestra will combine the Boston Symphony and the orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center. The day will begin at 4 p.m. with a series of programs by the students of the center. The main concert in the evening will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and Leopold Stokowski.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
NEW YORK SERVICE

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,063

JUL 30 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

DANBURY, CONN.
News-Times
Eve. Circ. 23,828

JUL 24 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
Transcript
Eve. Circ. 13,240

JUL 24 1964

Both BSO, Music Center Orchestras Play Aug. 19

The combined forces of the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras will be heard in the climactic concert of the annual Gala Evening in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Aug. 19. The orchestra will consist of 170 musicians who will be joined by a chorus of 200 for a portion of the concert.

Erich Leinsdorf and Leopold Stokowski, who is making his first appearance at Tanglewood this summer, will share the conducting.

First Since 1940

The concert will mark the first time since the founding of the Music Center in 1940 that the two orchestras have been formed into one ensemble for a complete program. The day's festivities will begin at 4 p. m. with a series of concerts by the 260 members of the Music Center who will be completing their eight weeks of study at Tanglewood Aug. 22.

The gala evening performances are for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer institution maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the advanced sutdy of music. The Music Center is the only such academy operated by a major symphony orchestra, and the performances through the eight-week session by its participants and the Gala Evening are a major source of funrs for the scholarship aid granted to many of these young musicians.

During the concert by the combined orchestras Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4; Strauss's' "Blue Danube" Waltzes in its original version with male chorus; and the March from Wagner's "Tannhauser" with the chorus of 200 voices. At the same program Leopold Stokowski will conduct the combined orchestras in Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue.

Reserved Seats

Reserved seats for the 8 p. m. concert in the Music Shed went on sale at the Tanglewood Box Office today. General admission tickets to the grounds will go on sale at 3 p. m., Aug. 19. Persons holding either reserved tickets for the evening concert or general admission tickets will be admitted to all other Music Center events, which will begin at 4 p. m.

Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,439

JUL 31 1964

Annual Gala Evening At Tanglewood Is Set For August 19

A chamber music program will be presented at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., by the members of the Music Center, Sunday night at 8 o'clock, in the Chamber Music Hall.

Sunday morning, August 2, at 10 o'clock, the weekly program of Music of J. S. Bach will take place in the Theatre.

Tickets are now on sale for the annual Gala Evening at Tanglewood on August 19. The program will benefit the Berkshire Music Center and will consist of several events beginning in mid-afternoon which will represent all departments of the Music Center.

The highlight of the day will be the evening concert in the Music Shed at 8 o'clock, at which the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will combine forces to form an orchestra of 170 musicians, conducted consecutively by Eric Leinsdorf and Leopold Stokowski. The giant orchestra will also be joined during the concert by a 200 voice chorus.

General admission tickets to the lawns will be available on August 19 at 3 p.m.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

AUG 13 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193

AUG 13 1964

Committees Announced For Tanglewood Gala

LENOX—Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, chairman of the Gala Evening at Tanglewood, announced Wednesday the names of committee members planning the annual benefit event Aug. 19 from 4 to 10 p. m. at Tanglewood.

Sole Benefit

The Gala will be the only benefit this season for the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music.

All departments of the Music Center will present programs through the afternoon and evening, including a supper hour concert during which visitors are encouraged to spread their own picnics on the lawns or purchase box suppers at the cafeteria.

The Gala Evening will come to a grand finale with a concert in the Music Shed at 8 p. m. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, has asked Leopold Stokowski to conduct a portion of the program with the combined forces of the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras.

Mrs. Henry B. Cabot, Mrs. Leinsdorf and Mrs. Endicott Peabody will serve as the honorary committee for the event. Other committee members are Mrs. John L. B. Brooke, Mrs. Bruce Crane, Mme. Anna de-Leuchtenberg, Mrs. Joseph de Pasquale, Mrs. Robert Underwood Johnson, Mrs. William Knoll, Mrs. John G. W. Mahanna, Mrs. Lawrence K. Miller, Mrs. Mac Morgan, Mrs. Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Mrs. John H. Rice, Mrs. J. C. Rosenfeld, Mrs. Bruce Sanborn, Mrs. John L. Senior, Mrs. Louis Speyer, Mrs. Edgar B. Stern, Mrs. Albert Sterner and Mrs. Willem Willeke.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

AUG 10 1964

350 Musicians To Perform At Tanglewood Annual Gala

LENOX — Tanglewood's annual gala evening will be highlighted by a concert given by 350 members of the combined Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center orchestras and the center's chorus Aug. 19.

Directed by both Erich Leinsdorf and guest conductor Leopold Stokowski, the 8 p.m. event will cap an afternoon of four concerts, whose proceeds will benefit the Berkshire Music Center. The grounds will be open at 3:30. The first concert, an ensemble of wind and brass instruments, will be heard on the Main House porch at 4.

At 5, visitors to Tanglewood will have a choice between two programs: string and vocal chamber music at the theater hall, and a concert of music by Tanglewood composers at the chamber music hall.

Supper Concert

A supper concert, at 6:30 from the Main House porch, will be presented by the Tanglewood Choir. It is traditional at this time for visitors to spread out the picnics they have brought or purchased from the cafeteria.

Reserved tickets for the performance by the combined orchestras are now on sale at the Tanglewood box office. General admission to the lawns will be available the afternoon of the concert. Both the reserved and general admission tickets will admit one to all events.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Herald
Morn. Circ. 176,483
JUL 27 1964

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,422

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
BROOKFIELD, Conn.
Weekly Independent
Circ. 1,202
0 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
News
Eve. Circ. 100,582
JUL 24 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JUL 24 1964

JUL 24 1964
OSWEGO, N.Y.
PALLADIUM-TIMES
D. 15,200
AUG 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 441,810
AUG 18 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal Record
AMHERST, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,551
JUL 30 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times
NEW MILFORD, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 4,096

THE TIMES RECORD
AUG

AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER & DEMOCRAT
D. 13,800
JUL 24 1964

GREENVILLE, N. Y.
LOCAL
W. 500
JUL 29 1964

ATHENS, N. Y.
HERALD
W. 300
JUL 30 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304
JUL 23 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WINSTED, CONN.
Citizen
Eve. Circ. 3,756
JUL 25 1964

Gala Evening Slated Aug. 19 At Tanglewood

In a concert reminiscent of the brilliant benefit performances held at Tanglewood during World War II, the combined forces of the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras will be heard in the climactic concert of the annual Gala Evening in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Aug. 19. The orchestra will consist of 170 musicians who will be joined by a chorus of 200 for a portion of the concert. Erich Leinsdorf and Leopold Stokowski, who is making his first appearance at Tanglewood this summer, will share the conducting.

The August 119 concert will be the first time, since the founding of the Music Center in 1940, that the two orchestras have been formed into one ensemble for a complete program. The day's festivities will begin at 4 p. m. with a series of concerts by the 260 members of the Music Center who will be completing their eight weeks of study at Tanglewood on Aug. 22. The Gala evening performances are for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer institution maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the advanced sudy of music. The Music Center is the only such academy operated by a major symphony orchestra, and the performances through the eight-week session by its participants and the gala evening are a major source of funds for the scholarship aid granted to many of these young musicians.

During the concert by the combined orchestras Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4; Strauss's "Blue Danube" waltzes in its original version with male chorus; and the March from Wagner's "Tannhouser" with the chorus of 200 voices. At the same program Leopold Stokowski will conduct the combined orchestras in Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue.

Reserved seats for the 8 p. m. concert in Music Shed will go on sale at the Tanglewood box office Friday morning, July 24, at 9 a. m. General admission tickets to the grounds will go on sale at 3 p. m. on Aug. 19. Persons holding either reserved tickets for the evening concert or General Admission tickets will be admitted to all other Music Center events, which will begin at 4 p. m.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 441,810
AUG 3 1964

SMART SET — By ROSE WALSH

Treat at Tanglewood

A treat for visitors at the Berkshire Festival will be heard Aug. 19 when the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras present a concert in the Music Shed at Tanglewood. Erich Leinsdorf and Leopold Stokowski, who is making his first appearance there this summer, will share conducting 170 musicians and a chorus of 200.

This will be the first time since the founding of the Music eCnter in 1940 that the two orchestras have been formed into one ensemble for a complete program. A series of concerts by the 260 members of the Center (who will be completing their eight weeks of study Aug. 22) will begin the festivities at 4 p. m.

The evening performances will benefit the Berkshire Music Center maintained by the Boston Symphony for the advanced study of music. The center is the only such academy operated by a major symphony orchestra, and the performances through the eight-week session by its participants and the evening is a major source of funds for the scholarship aid granted to many of these young musicians.

During the concert, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4; Strauss's "Blue Danube" waltzes in its original version with male chorus; and the march from Wagner's "Tannhauser" with the chorus of 200 voices. At the same program, Leppold Stokowski will conduct Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue.

General admission tickets go on sale at 3 p. m. on the day of the concert. Persons holding either reserved tickets for the evening concert or general admission will be admitted to all other Music Center events beginning at 4 o'clock.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 441,810
AUG 12 1964

TANGLEWOOD'S GALA EVE. AUG. 19

The highlight of the Gala Evening of five musical programs to be presented by the young musicians of the Music Center at Tanglewood Wednesday, Aug. 19, will be the "Extraordinary Concert" at 8 p. m. when Erich Leinsdorf and Leopold Stokowski will each conduct the combined Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

During the concert the Festival Chrous will join the combined orchestras making a total force of more than 350 performers.

The grounds will be opened to the public at 3:30 p. m. The first program, a concert of music for wind and brass instruments on the Porch of the Main House, will begin at 4 p. m.

At 5 o'clock, visitors to Tanglewood will have a choice between two programs: a concert of string and vocal chamber music in the theater and a concert of music by Tangelwood composers in the Chamber Music Hall.

At 6:30 p. m. there will be a supper concert by the Tanglewood Choir from the Porch of the Main House. At this hour it is traditional for visitors to spread their picnics on the surrounding lawns or to purchase box suppers from the Tanglewood Cafeteria.

Reserved seat tickets for the Extraordinary Concert in the Music Shed are on sale at the Tanglewood box office. General admission tickets to the lawns will go on sale the afternoon of the concert. Both the reserved tickets and general admission tickets will admit one to all the preceding events of the Gala Evening.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 144,855
AUG 18 1964

Tanglewood Gala Unites Students, Boston Symphony

Music will emanate from just about every corner of Tanglewood Wednesday when the Berkshire Music Center puts on its annual gala. Proceeds will benefit the scholarship fund of the Summer center for the advance study of music, maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On the porch of the Main House at 4 p.m., woodwind and brass ensembles will play works of Roussel, Schmidt, Gabrieli, Bozza, Haydn, Des Portes and Mozart.

An hour later in the Chamber Music Hall there will be performances of music by five current Tanglewood composers —Stock, Albright, Wilson, Arrigo and Lerdahl. Also at 5 p.m., in the Theater-Concert Hall, two chamber works by Brahms will be played.

A supper concert by the Tanglewood Choir at 6:30 on the Main House porch will include music of Purcell, Mendelssohn, Krenek, Piston, Gibbons, Marenzio, Vaughan Williams and Bernstein.

What is billed as an "Extraordinary Concert" will begin at 8 in the 6000-seat Music Shed. Erich Leinsdorf will start the program by conducting the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras in Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. Leopold Stokowski, in his Tanglewood debut, will then take over the same forces for his arrangement of the Bach Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor.

Leinsdorf will resume the program with the two orchestras and a male chorus in a performance of the original version of the Strauss waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube." The concluding work will be some 250 voices including Tanglewood personnel, in the Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from Act II of Wagner's "Tannhaeuser."

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Herald
Morn. Circ. 176,483
AUG 18 1964

5 Concerts Slated In Gala Evening At Tanglewood

The five concerts to be heard tomorrow at the Berkshire Music Center's Gala Evening at Tanglewood were announced yesterday.

Each department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for advanced study will be represented.

The programs will take place from 4 p.m. to 10 p.m. and will include a supper concert by the Tanglewood Choir plus an "Extraordinary Concert" at 8 p.m.

The later will include the combined forces of the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras, also a chorus of 250 voices.

The grounds will be opened at 3:30 p.m.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WORCESTER, MASS.
Gazette
Eve. Circ. 92,729
AUG 17 1964

AT TANGLEWOOD

There will be a gala evening at Tanglewood Wednesday from 4-10 p.m. when each department at the Berkshire Festival music center will perform. This includes a supper concert of choral music on the Great Lawn. At 8 Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an ex- Music Center orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center orchestra in an ex-

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 441,810
AUG 19 1964

GALA EVENING AT TANGLEWOOD WEDNESDAY

The annual Gala Evening at Tanglewood Wednesday for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center will consist of several events representing all departments of the Music Center and beginning in mid-afternoon.

The highlight will be the evening concert in the Music Shed at 8 p. m., at which the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras will combine forces to form an orchestra of 170 musicians, conducted consecutively by Erich Leinsdorf and Leopold Stokowski.

The giant orchestra will be joined also by a 200-voice chorus during the concert.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
GREENVILLE LOCAL
Wednesday, August 19, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YOR
STATE SERVICE
CAIRO HERALD
Thursday, August 20, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUR
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK
STATE SERVICE
ATHENS HERALD
Thursday, August 20, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUR
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK
STATE SERVICE
SCHENECTADY UNION STAR
Monday, August 17, 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Independent
AGAWAM, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,852
AUG 13 1964

PHYLLIS CURTIN AT TANGLEWOOD

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER STRING SYMPOSIUM AND GALA EVENING THIS WEEK

The Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will enter the final week of the 1964 season this week. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, will present its final three concerts in the Music Shed on Friday and Saturday evenings (Aug. 21-22) at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoon (Aug. 30) at 2:30, its final Open Rehearsal next Saturday morning (Aug. 22) at 10 a.m. and its final Chamber Music Concert this Tuesday evening (Aug. 18) at 8 p.m. The Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, will come to a close with a full week of events scheduled, including the String Symposium this Sunday and Monday (Aug. 16-17) and the great Gala Evening benefit, Wednesday evening (Aug. 19).

The final Tuesday Evening Chamber Music Concert will be held this Tuesday (Aug. 18) at 8 p.m. in the Theatre. Phyllis Curtin, soprano, who was soloist at the Festival concert of August 8 and is on the faculty of the Music Center's Vocal Department this summer, will give a recital of songs by Mozart, Wolf, Berg, Strauss, and contemporary Latin American and American songs. Ryan Edwards will be her accompanist.

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. — PHYLLIS CURTIN, Soprano, will present a Chamber Music Concert on Tuesday evening (August 18) at 8 p.m. in the Tanglewood Theatre. The program will include works by Mozart, Berg, Wolf, R. Strauss, and contemporary Latin American and American songs.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUR
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK
STATE SERVICE
POUGHKEEPSIE JOURNAL
Tuesday, August 11, 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Sunday Globe
Sun. Circ. 488,105
AUG 16 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WINSTED, CONN.
Citizen
Eve. Circ. 3,756
AUG 12 1964

Poughkeepsie Journal
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
D. 31,880 SUN. 33,868
AUG 11 1964
New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,439
AUG 10 1964

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 32,009
AUG 18 1964

Five Concerts Feature Lenox Gala Evening

The Berkshire Music Festival's "Gala Evening" at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., tomorrow will present five concerts with the first at 4 p.m. and the last at 8. One of them will be a supper concert during which visitors will be welcome to hold picnics on the lawns or purchase box suppers from the Tanglewood cafeteria.

The Gala Evening will be the only benefit this summer for the Berkshire Music Center which provides scholarship aid to about 75 per cent of its young musicians.

Winds and Brass

Music for winds and brass will make up the opening program at 4. This program will include Roussel's "Fanfare for a Sacred Heathen," Schmitt's "Fanfare from 'Antony and Cleopatra,'" Gabrieli's "Canzone No. 2 (1897)," Bozza's "Sonatine," Haydn's "Feldpartita in B Flat Major for Obes, Clarinets, Bassoons and Horns," Des Portes' "Italian Suite for Quartet of Flutes" and Mozart's "Serenade in C Minor for Winds, K. 388."

Two programs will be given at 5. A concert of music by Tanglewood composers at the Chamber Music Hall will include "Serenade," David Stock; "Salvos," William Albright; "Doubles," Donald Wilson; "Serenata," Girolamo Arrigo and "Variations," Fred Lerdahl.

A string and vocal chamber music program at the Theater-Concert Hall will present Brahms' "String Quintet in C Minor, Op. 51, No. 1" and "Liebeslieder Waltzes, Op. 52, for Double Vocal Quartet and Two Pianos."

The program for the supper concert at 6:30, includes the "Scene of the Drunken Poet" from Purcell's "The Fairy Queen," Mendelssohn's "Part Songs," Krenek's "Pater Noster and First Prayer," from "Five Prayers," Piston's "Carnival Song," Gibbons' "The Silver Swan," Marenzio's "When Spring Returns," Vaughan Williams' "Three Shakespeare Songs," and choruses from Bernstein's "The Lark."

Final Program

The final program at 8 by the combined Boston Symphony Orchestra, Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Festival Chorus will include Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 4," conducted by Erich Leinsdorf; Bach's "Passacglia and Fugue in C Minor," conducted by Leopold Stokowski; Strauss' "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" in the original version with male chorus, conducted by Leinsdorf, and the "Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg" from Wagner's "Tannhauser," conducted by Leinsdorf.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,499
AUG 10 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
AUG 10 1964

Leinsdorf Lists Gala Evening At Tanglewood Event

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, has announced the order of events for the five musical programs to be presented from 4 p.m. to 10 p.m. by the young musicians of the Music Center during the annual Gala Evening at Tanglewood Wednesday, Aug. 19. All proceeds from the Gala Evening will benefit the Berkshire Music Center.

Opens at 3.30

The grounds will be opened to the public at 3.30 p.m. The first program will be a concert of music for wind and brass instruments on the porch of the main house, beginning at 4.00.

At 5 visitors to Tanglewood will have a choice between two programs: a concert of string and vocal chamber music in the theater, and a concert of music by Tanglewood composers in the chamber music hall.

At 6.30 there will be a supper concert by the Tanglewood Choir from the porch of the main house. At this hour it is traditional for visitors to spread their picnics on the surrounding lawns or to purchase box suppers from the Tanglewood Cafeteria.

The highlight of the Gala Evening will be the "Extraordinary Concert" in the music shed at 8. Leinsdorf and Leopold Stokowski will each conduct the combined Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. During the concert the Festival Chorus will join the combined orchestras, making a total force of over 350 performers.

Reserved tickets for the "Extraordinary Concert" in the Music Shed are now on sale at the Tanglewood Box Office. General admission tickets to the lawns will go on sale the afternoon of the concert. Both the reserved tickets and general admission tickets will admit one to all the preceding events of the Gala Evening.

CAPITAL PRESS BUREAU
NEWS CLIPPINGS
COMPLIMENTS OF
STATE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE
AUG 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
AUG 21 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,611

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 17 1964

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923
AUG 17 1964

Tanglewood Concerts Set Wednesday

The complete programs for the five concerts to be heard Wednesday at the Berkshire Music Center's "Gala Evening at Tanglewood" were announced yesterday by Erich Leinsdorf, director of the music center.

THE PROGRAMS will take place from 4 through 10 p.m. and will include a supper concert by the Tanglewood choir during which visitors may spread their own picnics on the lawns or purchase box suppers from the Tanglewood cafeteria.

The evening will end with a concert by the Boston symphony and the Berkshire Music Center orchestra under the joint direction of Leopold Stokowski and Leinsdorf. A chorus of some 250 voices will join the two orchestras for the final number.

The day's events will benefit the music center, which provides scholarship aid to about 75 per cent of the young musicians who study there.

THE PROGRAMS follow:

4 p.m. — Porch of the main house; music for winds and brass

Roussel: Fanfare for a Sacred Heathen
Schmitt, Florent: Fanfare from "Anthony and Cleopatra," Op. 69
Gabrieli, Giovanni: Canzone II (1897)
Bozza: Sonatine
Haydn: Feldpartita in B-flat major for oboes, clarinets, bassoons and horns
Des Portes: Italian Suite for Quartet of Flutes
Mozart: Serenade in C minor for Winds, K. 388

5 p.m. — Chamber music hall: concert of music by Tanglewood composers.

David Stock: Serenade
William Albright: Salvos
Donald Wilson: Doubles
Girolamo Arrigo; Serenata
Fred Lerdahl: Variations

5 p.m. — Theater-concert hall; string and vocal chamber music.

Brahms: String Quintet in C minor, Op. 51, No. 1
Brahms: Liebeslieder Waltzes, Op. 52, for Double Vocal Quartet and Two Pianos

6:30 p.m. — Porch of the main house; supper concert by the Tanglewood choir.

Purcell: Scene of the Drunken poet, from "The Fairy Queen"
Mendelssohn: Part Songs
Krenek; Pater Noster and First Prayer, from "Five Prayers"
Piston: Carnival Song
Gibbons: The Silver Swan
Marenzio: When Spring Returns
Vaughan Williams: Three Shakespeare Songs
Bernstein: Choruses from "The Lark"

8 p.m. — Music shed: The combined Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and the Festival Chorus.

Tachikovsky: Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36 Conducted by Erich Leinsdorf Bach: Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor (aranged by Leopold Stokowski) Conducted by Leopold Stokowski)
Strauss: Waltzes, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube"—in the original version with male chorus. Conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf
Wagner: Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser," Act II—with augmented chorus Conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WATERBURY, CONN.
Republican
Morn. Circ. 24,059
AUG 21 1964

Gala Evening Success At Tanglewood

(Special To The Republican)

LENOX, MASS. — The gala evening of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood Wednesday afternoon and evening was a success from every angle. Weather, music, and attendance of 8,193 all combined to make it a financial success to the tune of $18,405.50 for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center some of whose students were awarded prizes and scholarships during the intermission.

Leopold Stokowski, conducting at Tanglewood for the first time, as guest conductor gave the unusual and tightly performed Bach "Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor." The ovation he received was tremendous.

Erich Leinsdorf, director, conducted the other parts of the program which included Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 4" in a performance as crisp as the autumn air which added snap to the afternoon and evening in the Berkshires. He led the orchestra through Strauss waltzes "By the Beautiful Blue Danbe" with a male chorus and in Wagner's entrance of the guests into the Wartburg from the second act of "Tannhauser."

The orchestra augmented with the students totaled 175 musicians and the combined chorus totaled 200. It was in truth a gala performance with trumpeters placed off to the left outer apron of the shed.

Mr. Leinsdorf was in fine form during the evening, made one of his few talks to the audience as he presented the award winners, presented Leopold Stokowski, added an unscheduled performance of a Sousa march for the final selection, and twirled the microphone as though it were a band leader's baton.

It was the nearest thing to the fireworks finales of the galas of other years when Koussevitzky was director. The audience loved every bit of it from the early afternoon programs of music, the picnicking on the lawns, to the supper concert by the Tanglewood Choir on the porch of the main house, overlooking the glass-smooth, sunsprayed Stockbridge Bowl below.

Thousands sat on the lawn to listen to the concert while many were busy eating chicken, salad, sandwiches, consuming beverages that ran from pop, through beer and the occassional bottle of vintage wine. It was really a feast for the gods.

The afternoon program began at 4 p. m. with wind music by members of the instrumental department on the porch of the main house, was followed by string and vocal chamber music of Brahms in the theater-concert hall and music of Tanglewood composers in the chamber music hall at the same time. The Fromm Fellowship Players were supervised by Gunther Schuller. The supper concert included music and songs of Purcell, Piston, Gibbons, Vaughan Williams, and Bernstein.

Among winners of awards and prizes were two Connecticut young musicians. One of the six Mary M. Fowler awards went to David D. Quattrone of Riverside, Conn. and one of the Mr. and Mrs. William Rosenwald awards went to J. David Ohanian, Westport.

For the first time a special award, honoring Henry B. Cabot, for 32 years a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and for 19 of those years its president, was awarded as a gift of the musicians. Each award carried with it a check for $225.

The awards went to David J. Shostac, Los Angeles, flutist; Lew Norton, Tulsa, Okla., of the double bass section; and Ronald A. Borror, Wilmington, Ohio, of the trombone and tuba section. The coveted Koussevitzky Memorial Conducting Prize and the Mrs. Eleanor R. Crane Memorial Prize went to Melvin Strauss of Leonia, N. J.

The Koussevitzky Tanglewood Composition Prize went to William H. Albright of West Orange, N. J., composer-organist. Other awards included the Albert Spalding Prize to Marylow Speaker, violinist, of Portland, Oregon; the Joseph Silverstein Prize to Virginia A. Halfmann of Northport, N. Y. The Raphael Sagalyn Award went to Charles M. Dodge, composer, Ames, Iowa. Four William Schwann Awards were made also.

The Berkshire Festival will come to an end on Sunday afternoon with Mr. Leinsdorf conducting that afternoon as well as on Saturday night.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
AUG 20 1964

At Tanglewood

Annual Gala Evening Held As Music Center Benefit

By FRANK N. PATTERSON

The Gala Evening at Tanglewood runs from 4 to 10 o'clock each year for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center School, includes performances by all the student departments. The programs offer the public not only a chance to observe what is going on at the world famous music center, but an admirable opportunity to enjoy the results as well.

Appetizer in Music

An appetizer in music for brass and woodwinds played to persons resting on the lawn began at 4. The audience moved at 5 to a choice of wine-like concerts for string and vocal music in the Theater-Concert Hall, or for the flavor of cocktails, contemporary music in the Chamber Music Hall. Standing in the proper spot on the lawn, one could, for inebriating results, partake of both concerts at once.

In time to dine at 6:30 there was an excellent supper concert by the Tanglewood choir to a munching audience picnicking on the lawns, that seemed programmed for each course—Purcell to Bernstein.

The final event at 8 labeled an "Extraordinary Concert" was just that and no less. A double orchestra compounded of the BSO joined by members of the Music Center Orchestra, plus the Festival Chorus, augmented by any who could sing at all (i.e. composers) seemed to result frequently in 375 performers trying to be heard. Naturally they were heard, yet at frequent intervals the listening was a stunning, earfilling surfeit to even the most gluttonous appetite.

Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony, of course, in many ways was muddy and even clumsy with such numbers, but for portions of light orchestration Mr. Leinsdorf simply made half his forces tacit. For the famous pizzicato scherzo, however, all strings were employed with novel results. And most satisfactory sounds were heard in the fiery finale.

All Sound He Could Muster

The long fingers and hands of Leopold Stokowski that conducted Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor made frank employment of all the sound he could muster. It was amusing to note that Stokowski used a score for this, his own arrangement of the work, in a summer that has for most other conductors been scoreless.

8,193 Listeners Hear 5 Concerts, Prizes Awarded

Strauss Waltzes "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" from the original version with male chorus lent a Pops atmosphere to the concert and also reminded the more ancient Gala Event concert,goers of Koussevitsky's performance of waltzes and the audience's spontaneous reaction with shoeless waltzing on the lawn.

Wagner's "Entrance of the Guests into Wartburg" from Tannhauser created some stir, but what finished the evening's feast was the "Stars and Stripes Forever" by the two orchestras. The effect might be likened to allowing a five-gaited horse to have his head or an orgy of extremism — without partisanship.

During the 7½ hours between 3.30 and 1 at Tanglewood, Lenox, yesterday 20 members of the Berkshire Music Center were awarded 21 prizes, more than 400 musicians performed in public and 8,193 listeners paid $18,405 to hear 25 pieces played at five concerts.

It was the annual "Gala Evening," a series of public performances to benefit the Berkshire Music School scholarship fund and to demonstrate the talents of the center's members.

At intermission Leinsdorf announced and introduced the award winners as follows:

Henry B. Cabot prizes: David J. Shostac, Lew Norton and Ronald A. Borror.

Joseph Silverstein prize: Virginia A. Halfmann.

Albert Spalding prize: Marylou Speaker.

Koussevitzky memorial conducting prize and the Mrs. Eleanor R. Crane memorial prize, Melvin Strauss.

Koussevitzky Tanglewood composition prize: William H. Albrith.

Raphael Sagalyn award: Charles M. Dodge.

The following prizes were presented backstage before the concert: Mary M. Fowler award: David M. Felton, Gwen E. Jones, David D. Quattrone, Geoffrey P. Hellman, Barbara A. Heinen and Thomas D. Woodhams.

Mr. and Mrs. William Rosenwald award: Darrell L. Barnes and J. David Ohanian.

William Schwann award: Freddie V. Slatkin, Cheryl Stern, Thomason W. Hanks an William E. Lane.

None of the winners were Massachusetts residents.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 3-4200
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,435
AUG 9 1964

Music

Gala Evening Set at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Not since the brilliant benefit performances held at Tanglewood during World War II has such a climactic concert been planned as for the annual Berkshire Music Center gala evening in the music shed on Wednesday evening, Aug. 19.

For the first time since the Music Center was founded in 1940, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will be formed into one ensemble for a complete program. The 170 players will be conducted alternately by Erick Leinsdorf and Leopold Stokowski.

Major Souces of Funds

This summer there are 260 members of the center, the educational department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is the only such academy operated by a major symphony orchestra. The performances through the eight-week session by its participants, one concert by the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, and the gala evening are major sources of funds for the scholarship aid granted to many of these young musicians.

On Aug. 19 the parade of festivities will begin at 4 p.m. with a series of demonstrations in the various concert halls and gardens at Tanglewood.

During the concert by the combined orchestras, Leinsdorf will conduct Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, Strauss' "Blue Danube" Waltzes in their original version with male chorus, and the March from Wagners' "Tannhauser" with a mixed chorus of 200 voices. Stokowski will conduct the combined orchestras in Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor.

Reserved seats in the music shed are already on sale at the Tanglewood box office. General admission tickets to the grounds will go on sale at 3 p.m., Aug. 19. Persons holding either reserved tickets for the evening concert or general admission tickets will be admitted to all other Music Center events, beginning at 4 p.m.

A Million Attendance

Last summer's eight-week total attendance at Tanglewood was 234,000. The recent jazz festival at Newport attracted about 40,000 persons, and the folk festival, 70,000.

All of these create what sound like monumental problems of traffic and order. At Tanglewood it is a matter of traffic as anyone can testify who has made that creeping, bumper-to-bumper journey over the mile-and-a-quarter from the Tanglewood gate to Lenox Center.

It is difficult to imagine how the tremendous influx was handled from May 23rd to June 21st at the Vienna Festival. Almost 1 million persons attended 91 different performances, including 40 operas, 37 plays, 12 operettas and two ballets.

Berkshire Society

Two social events of uncommon interest will take place on Tuesday, Aug. 11, in the Lenox-Lee area of the Berkshires.

During the afternoon there will be a reception for Ruth St. Denis and Ted Shawn at Jacob's Pillow, famous summer center of the dance. Mr. and Mrs. Shawn, founders of the Denishawn Dancers, are celebrating their golden wedding anniversary.

That evening, after the Lenox Quartet plays a concert in the Chamber Music Hall at Tanglewood, there will be a reception at Seranak for Paul Fromm.

The Fromm Music Foundation has sponsored contemporary music and chamber music at the Berkshire Music Center for many years. Seranak is the summer home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the conductor.

The name Seranak is derived from Serge and the late Natalie Koussevitzky. She was the conductor's first wife. The preser Mrs. Koussevitzky was his se retary and a niece of Nata

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499
AUG 21 1964

Tanglewood Gala Evening

The annual Gala Evening at Tanglewood, the only benefit program this summer for the Berkshire Music Center, started as usual at 4 with a program of wind music by members of the instrumental department, given on the porch of the Main House, overlooking scenic Stockbridge Bowl set among the lush green hills, single contender for Tanglewood's own spacious and beautifully kept surroundings.

Roussel's Fanfare for a Sacred Heathen welcomed the gay throngs of every age and descriptive dress, who sat or milled about during the ensuing numbers by Florent Schmitt, Giovanni Gabrieli, Bozza, Haydn, Desportes, ending with Mozart's Serenade in C minor for winds K.388, music marvelously, and form its inception, suited to the out-of-doors.

In the theatre concert hall at 5, a student chamber music group played, under difficult circumstances (that of wandering people seeking seats during the performance) with good style, but quite varied intonations, the extremely difficult and beautiful Brahms Quartet in C minor, Op. 51, Mo. 1.

Then followed a warmly studious and capable performance of the mellifluous Liebeslieder Waltzes, Op. 53, with pianists Cheryl Stern and Geoffrey Hellman accompanying, at one piano, the double quartet, all voices with well-blended timbres and articulation clear and suitably projected for the varied flow, lilt or bounce of all 18 waltzes.

In the Chamber Music Hall five of the Tanglewood composers were heard, David Stock, William Albright, Donald Wilson, Girolamo Arrigo and Fred Lendahl. Then at 6:30 among the gathered listeners spread over the lawns and picnicking, or just sitting, on lawn chairs, or blankets, in front of the Main House, the Tanglewood choir performed a delightful program of music by Purcell, a Scene from the Fairy Queen, of the Drunken Poet, excellently characterized by Samuel Cosby, and conducted by David Quattrone, two Mendelssohn Part songs, the flowing Abscheid von Wald, and light-hearted Jaglied, directed by David Felton and Jerry Ann Galloway, the latter with rather stiff but very meaningful gestures; Krenek's moving Pater Noster and First Prayer from "Five Prayers" at David Johnson's firm direction; the male chorus and brass choir from Piston's lively Carnival Song conducted with animation by Thomas A. Sokol; the Silver Swan, short and sweet, by Bibbons, capably led by Amy Kaiser, Smith '65; Marenzio's When Spring Returns, directed by the knowing Carlotta Wilson; James Cunningham of the Berkshire Center's staff, conducting Vaughan Williams' Three Shakespeare Songs, and Festival Chorus director Lorna Cooke deVaron finishing with some French and Latin choruses from Bernstein's "The Lark," rhythmically stirring, and dramatic.

After gathering up and stowing away picnic encumbrances, the happy milling throng converged on the Big Shed for the final "Extraordinary Concert," in which the student orchestra joined the BSO on stage to produce an orchestra totaling 200, and the chorus, with many members of the Tanglewood administrative staff among them for the final number, Wagner's Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhauser" Act II, added up to 175 participants.

It was an exhilirating experience for all concerned, the young musicians joining the virtuosos at the tuttis, produced an amazingly integrated sound, each one of them striving for his best. Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony opened the concert with Mr. Leinsdorf coordinating the performers in a truly exciting projection, if one doesn't consider the purists.

After the presentation of several awards, Mrs. Leinsdorf introduced another "youngster," Leopold Stokowski, still the "great" director, who led the combined orchestras in his famous arrangement of Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, a very moving performance.

Strauss' Waltzes "By the Beautiful Danube" in the original version with male chorus were the joyous and next to last number, with many humming the familiar songs spontaneously and exuberantly.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
American (e)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,200
AUG 21 1964

Tanglewood Gala Proves Successful

(Special to The American)

LENOX, MASS. — The gala evening of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood Wednesday afternoon and evening was a success from every angle. Weather, music, and attendance of 8,199 all combined to make it a financial success to the tune of $18,405.50 for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center some of whose students were awarded prizes and scholarships during the intermission.

Leopold Stokowski, conducting at Tanglewood for the first time, as guest conductor gave the unusual and tightly performed Bach "Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor." The ovation he received was tremendous.

Erich Leinsdorf, director, conducted the other parts of the program which included Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 4" in a performance as crisp as the autumn air which added snap to the afternoon and evening in the Berkshires. He led the orchestra through Strauss waltzes "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" with a male chorus and in Wagner's entrance of the guests into the Wartburg from the second act of "Tannhauser."

The orchestra augmented with the students totaled 175 musicians and the combined chorus totaled 200. It was in truth a gala performance with trumpeters placed off to the left outer apron of the shed.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 20 1964

Music Review

Gala at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

A CONCERT by the combined orchestras of the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center was the culmination of a "Gala" evening at Tanglewood yesterday. Erich Leinsdorf led the 175 musicians in the Tchaikovsky 4th Symphony; the original version of the Johann Strauss waltzes "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" with male chorus; the "Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg" from Wagner's Tannhauser, performed with an augmented chorus; and, as an encore, but "the" memorable bit of the evening, Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever." Nine piccolos stood in a row for the rousing obbligato they have in a particular spot, and for the brass fanfare which follows an arm corps of trumpets, trombones horns and bazookas blossome like century plants to blow delirium into the spirits of the happy audience of more than 8,000.

* * *

CONCERTMASTER Joseph Silverstein leaned down to his left for some mysterious purpose at this point, but in due time came up with a long, silver, drum-major's baton with a huge globe on one end. He handed it to Leinsdorf who all but twirled it in the air. Nor did he change to tutus.

* * *

AFTER intermission, Leinsdorf awarded the prizes which the Center gives to the most meritorius students in various classes. Then for one single work, his own arrangement for orchestra of a Passacaglia and Fugue (in C Minor) of Bach, Leopold Stokowski came on stage as the honored guest of the evening. Mr. Stokowski is a veteran of more than 50 years dominance in orchestral conducting. He will have a full program of his own tomorrow night when he will conduct the Boston orchestra in the final Friday evening of the Tanglewood season.

3 DAY MUSICOLOGICAL SYMPOSIUM

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302
APR 19 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360
APR 18 1964

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
FLATBUSH LIFE
W. 15,500
JUL 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
R. I. Herald
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Weekly Circ. 12,221
APR 17 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
JUN 28 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 • 742-4200
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
Transcript
Eve. Circ. 13,240

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bee
NEWTOWN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,085
MAY 1

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
APR 15 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
APR 26 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
APR 16 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,730
APR 16 1964

Musical Symposium Set For Tanglewood

Six Sessions Planned For July 13, 14, 15

PAGE ONE

Scholars of Eighteenth and Nineteenth Century Music Will Assemble at Berkshire Music Center.—David Hughes of Harvard University Music Department, Will Be Chairman.

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center, has announced that a three-day musicological symposium will be held at Tanglewood in Lenox in July. To this significant symposium Mr. Leinsdorf has invited some of the best-known musicologists in this country. Six sessions will be held at Tanglewood on July 13, 14, and 15 under the chairmanship of David Hughes, chairman of the Department of Music at Harvard Univeristy. With his announcement of the musicological symposium Mr. Leinsdorf said:

"In keeping with the basic purpose of the Berkshire Music Center, that is, to form a bridge between school and professional life, we feel that it is desirable to hold this symposium as a clear demonstration that the science of musicology can be of service to the performer. Further, it is important to have a clear-cut concept of the sources from which better information about performance techniques in the last two centuries can be gathered. We have found in examining scholarly work in preparation for this symposium that there has been little done, relatively speaking, on nineteenth century performance techniques. As the performer is mainly interested in techniques after, let us say, the dates of Bach's life, we have invited scholars of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries to be with us."

At each of the six sessions of the symposium one of the participants will deliver a paper followed by discussion among the entire panel and the audience. The sessions of the symposium will be open to the members of the Berkshire Music Center, the faculty, and the public. Times for the various sessions will be announced at a later date.

In addition to Mr. Hughes the symposium participants will include: Martin Bernstein of New York University; Nathan Broder, president of the American Musicological Society, who will speak on "Ornamentation in Mozart;" Elliot Forbes of Harvard University; Paul Henry Lang, retired music critic of the New York Herald Tribune; Jan La Rue of New York University; Arthur Mendel of Princeton University, who will speak on "Detailed Analysis of Bach's Work for Performance Purposes;" Donald Mintz of Washington, D. C., who will discuss "The Sketches and Published Scores of the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony;" and Nicholas Slonimsky of Boston. The list of panelists and topics is not complete.

The Berkshire Music Center, the summer center for the advanced study of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, will open on June 28 and continue for eight weeks in conjunction with the orchestra's Berkshire Festival.

Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,093
JUL 1 1964

Symposium at Lenox

The three-day musicological Symposium at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.), will take place July 13 through 15, with 11 participants.

They are David Hughes, chairman, Martin Bernstein, Nathan Broder, Elliot Forbes, Karl Geiringer, Donald Grout, Paul Henry Lang, Jan LaRue, Arthur Mendel, Donald Mintz, and Nicolas Slonimsky.

There will be six sessions, and one participant will deliver a paper at each on 18th or 19th century performance techniques, with the entire panel and audience participating in subsequent discussion. Sessions will be held in the Chamber Music Hall at Tanglewood.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105
JUL 12 1964

Musicologists At Tanglewood For Symposium

Fifteen leading musicologists will take part in a three-day symposium at Tanglewood on 18th and 19 century performance practices.

The lectures and discussion periods will take place daily at 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. in the Concert Hall, tomorrow through Wednesday. Programs are open to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, those who make a voluntary contribution to the support of the Boston Symphony's Summer center for the advanced study of music.

Monday morning, Karl Geiringer of the University of California, Santa Barbara, will speak on problems of the use of the continuo in 18th century music. "A Detailed Analysis of Bach: 'Erbarme dich' for Performance Purposes" will be the topic of Princeton's Arthur Mendel on Monday afternoon.

Nathan Broder, president of the American Musicological Society, will talk Tuesday morning on ornamentation in Mozart. The afternoon lecture by Jan LaRue of New York University will be on tempo in 1806, a contemporary guide.

"The Sketches and Published Scores of the Mendelssohn 'Italian' Symphony" is the topic Wednesday morning of Donald Mintz of the Washington (D.C.) Star. The symposium will conclude that afternoon with a lecture by Nicolas Slonimsky of Boston on the Russian orchestral sound.

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 339,766
JUL 12 1964

Lenox, Mass.: Tanglewood activities this week include a three-day symposium on 18th- and 19th-century performance practices, sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among the musicologists participating in the symposium is Donald Mintz, daily book reviewer for The Star. He will discuss "The Sketches and Published Scores of the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony." Some of the country's most eminent music scholars are to read papers during the symposium.

Marlboro, Vt.: Pablo Casals, who has been holding cello master classes and conducting at the Marlboro Festival since June 23, makes his final appearance today. He will conduct the festival orchestra in three of the Brandenburg Concerti of J. S. Bach.

Munich, Germany: The Bavarian State Opera Festival begins Friday and runs through August 16. The festival repertoire includes a complete roundup of works by Richard Strauss, and representative works by Handel, Mozart, Wagner, Gluck, and Werner Egk.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
APR 19 1964

Musicological Symposium At Tanglewood July 13-15

A panel of American musicologists will discuss how scholarship can be of use to performers at a symposium to be held July 13-16 at the Berkshire Music Center. Six sessions will be held in the three-day period, under the chairmanship of David Hughes, chairman of the music department, Harvard.

In announcing the symposium, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony and of the orchestra's Summer center for the advanced study of music, said:

"In keeping with the basic purpose of the Berkshire Music Center, that is, to form a bridge between school and professional life, we feel that it is desirable to hold this symposium as a clear demonstration that the science of musicology can be of service to the performer. Further, it is important to have a clear-cut concept of the sources from which better information about performance techniques in the last two centuried can be gathered. We have found in examining scholarly work in preparation for this symposium that there has been little done, relatively speaking, on 19th Century performance techniques. As the performer is mainly interested in techniques after, let us say, the dates of Bach's life, we have invited scholars of the 18th and 19th Centuries to be with us."

At each of the six sessions of the symposium one of the participants will deliver a paper followed by discussion among the entire panel and the audience. The sessions of the symposium will be open to the members of the Berkshire Music Center, the faculty, and the public. Times for the various sessions will be announced at a later date.

In addition to David Hughes the symposium participants will include:

Martin Bernstein of New York University; Nathan Broder, president of the American Musicological Society, who will speak on "Ornamentation in Mozart;" Elliot Forbes of Harvard University; Paul Henry Lang, retired Music Critic of the New York Herald Tribune; Jan La Rue of New York University; Arthur Mendel of Princeton University, who will speak on "Detailed Analysis of Bach's Work for Performance Purposes;" Donald Mintz of Washington, D.C., who will discuss "The Sketches and Published Scores of the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony;" and Nicholas Slonimsky of Boston. The list of panelists and topics is not complete.

The Berkshire Music Center will open on June 28 and continue for eight weeks in conjunction with the Berkshire Festival.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,435
MAY 10 1964

Music

Symposium

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

A three-day musicological symposium, July 13, 14, and 15, is planned at Tanglewood for brow-wrinklers who like to explore profound aspects of the art.

Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf is introducing six sessions at the Berkshire Music Center "as a clear understanding that the science of musicology can be of service to the performer."

To supervise these deep-seated discussions will be David Hughes, chairman of the music department at Harvard University.

In case you want to do some advance research: "Ornamentation in Mozart" will be deliberated by Nathan Broder, president of the American Musicological Society; Arthur Mendel of Princeton University will speak on "Detailed Analysis of Bach's Works for Performance Purposes," and Donald Mintz of Washington, D.C., has for a topic, "The Sketches and Published Scores of the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony."

Other jovial subjects will be reviewed by Martin Bernstein, New York University; Elliot Forbes, Harvard University; Paul Henry Lang, retired music critic of the New York Her-

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711
JUN 23 1964

Tanglewood Musicology Symposium Details Set

Eleven musicologists under the chairmanship of prof. David Hughes, Harvard University, will participate in a three-day musicological symposium at Tanglewood, July 13-15.

At each session one of the participants will deliver a paper dealing with 18th or 19th Century performance techniques, which will be followed by discussion among the entires panel and the audience. The sessions of the symposium will be open to the members of the Music Center, the faculty, and Friends of the Berkshire Music Center—those who make a voluntary contribution toward the support of the Center.

In addition to Prof. Hughes the symposium participants will include Martin Bernstein, New York University; Nathan Border, president, American Musicologist Society; Elliot Forbes, Harvard; Karl Geiringer, University of California, Santa Barbara; Donald Grout, Cornell; Paul Henry Lang, Columbia; Jan LaRue, New York University; Arthur Mendel, Princeton; Donald Mintz, the Washington Evening Star; Nicolas Slonimsky, Boston.

At the first session on Monday, July 13, at 10 a.m., Geiringer will present a paper on "Problems of the Use of the Continuo in Eighteenth Century Music." The second session, at 2 p.m., will hear Mendel give "A Detailed Analysis of Bach's 'Erbarme dich' for Performance Purposes." On Tuesday, July 14, at 10 a.m., Broder will speak on "Ornamentation in Mozart." At 2 p.m. on Tuesday, LaRue will presnt a paper on "Tempo in 1806: A Contemporary Guide."

Wednesday morning, July 15, at 10, the panel and audience will hear Mintz discuss "The Sketches and Published Scores of the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony." At the final session Wednesday afternoon at 2, Slonimsky will speak on "The Russian Orchestral Sound."

All the sessions of the Musicological Symposium will be held in the 300-seat Chamber Music Hill at Tanglewood.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
APR 16 1964

Tanglewood Plans Symposium On 18th, 19th-Century Music

A musicological symposium on 18th and 19th-century music has been scheduled at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox this summer, according to an announcement by director Erich Leinsdorf.

Best in Nation

Mr. Leinsdorf has invited to Tanglewood some of the best known musicologists in this country. Six sessions will be held at Tanglewood on July 13, 14 and 15 under the chairmanship of David Hughes, chairman of the Department of Music at Harvard University.

With his announcement of the musicological symposium, Leinsdorf said:

"In keeping with the basic purpose of the Berkshire Music Center, that is, to form a bridge between school and professional life, we feel that it is desirable to hold this symposium as a clear demonstration that the science of musicology can be of sources from which better information about performance techniques in the last two centuries can be gathered. We have found in examining scholarly work in preparation for this symposium that there has been little done, relatively speaking, on nineteenth century performance techniques. As the performer is mainly interested in techniques after, let us say, the dates of Bach's life, we have invited scholars of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries to be with us."

At each of the six sessions of the symposium one of the participants will deliver a paper followed by discussion among the entire panel and the audience. The sessions of the symposium will be open to the members of the Berkshire Music Center, the faculty, and the public. Times for the various sessions will be announced at a later date.

In addition to Hughes the symposium participants will include:

Martin Bernstein of New York University; Nathan Broder, president of the American Musicological Society, who will speak on "Ornamentation in Mozart"; Elliot Forbes of Harvard University; Paul Henry Lang, retired music critic of the New York Herald Tribune; Jan La Rue of New York University; Arthur Mendel of Princeton University, who will speak on "Detailed Analysis of Bach's Work for Performance Purposes"; Donald Mintz of Washington, D.C., who will discuss "The Sketches and Published Scores of the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony"; and Nicholas Slonimsky of Boston. The list of panelists and topics is not complete.

The Berkshire Music Center, the summer center for the advanced study of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, will open on June 28 and continue for eight weeks in conjunction with the orchestra's Berkshire Festival.

New York Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384
JUL 16 1964

Symposium at Tanglewood

A Step in Right Direction

By Judith Robison

LENOX, Mass.

There is no question that being educated is hard work. Just how rigorous it can be sometimes was demonstrated at the three-day Musicological Symposium that took place Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of this week here at the Berkshire Music Center. The participants often seemed as severely exercised as the audience of students and Friends of the Center.

Director Erich Leinsdorf conceived of the Symposium as one of the first steps in broadening the type of music education offered at Tanglewood. "There must be more rapport between musicologists and musicians . . . so that these young people know what the problems are and where to find the solution." At the six sessions this week, "rapport" was the hardest thing to come by.

The panel of 10 professors and scholars was ably moderated by Chairman David Hughes, Harvard University. Participating were Martin Bernstein, New York University; Nathan Broder, president, American Musicological Society; Elliot Forbes, Harvard University; Karl Geiringer, University of California; Donald Grout, Cornell University; Paul Henry Lang, Columbia University; Jan LaRue, New York University; Arthur Mendel, Princeton University; Donald Mintz and Nicholas Slonimsky.

In the first two sessions on Monday the lectures and the discussions were tantalizingly vague, but by Tuesday matters picked up with Nathan Broder's highly informative "Oramentation in Mozart," and an original paper by Mr. LaRue, "Tempo in 1806: A Contemporary Guide," which agitated some of the old-guard musicians with its unconventional conclusions.

The final sessions yesterday were less well attended, and it seemed that so much information packed into such a short time had tired everyone. The panel looked worn, too, in spite of the youthful evaluation of the value of printed scores by Mr. Mintz, in his lecture, "The Sketches and Published Scores of the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony," and the closing witty analysis by Mr. Slonimsky of "The Russian Orchestral Sound."

There is no question that the sessions were of most value to those of the audience who had at least nodding acquaintance with the rudiments of style and performance practices of different historical periods. These rudiments are being provided for the first time this summer at Tanglewood, in a series of lectures by harpsichordist Igor Kipnis, that with the musical milieu and performance practices of the 18th Century, and knowledge is being put into action at the student Bach concerts each Sunday.

Mr. Leinsdorf's ideal for the Tanglewood students is nothing less than "a total knowledge of a composer's output and a complete understanding of the atmosphere in which he existed and from which he took his inspiration." While this first Musicological Symposium does not claim to have accomplished even a part of this goal, it is an encouraging step in the right direction.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785
APR 12 1964

WORLD OF MUSIC

The Twain to Meet at Tanglewood: Musicologists and Performers

By ROSS PARMENTER

THE American Musicological Society has 1,600 members and most of them are convinced they have quite a lot to offer to practicing musicians, especially on how music of the past should be performed. They feel that what they have learned about performances practices should be drawn upon by interpreters. But, on the whole, they have found interpreters decidedly cool, even disinterested. On the other hand, a few interested performers have come away feeling they had been high-hatted.

Because of the gap, musicologists are rejoicing over one of the innovations that Erich Leinsdorf is introducing at Tanglewood this summer. It is to be a symposium on 18- and 19th-century performance practices. Six sessions will be held, with a learned paper being read at each one. Then panelists will be called on to comment.

"One of the ideas and purposes of this symposium," says Mr. Leinsdorf, "is to enable musicologists to challenge theories which seem farfetched or not entirely provable, and thereby to prevent performers from falling prey to the first book or the first authority with which they come in contact.

Concepts

"We feel that it is important to have a clear-cut concept of the sources from which better information about performance techniques in the last two centuries can be gathered. We have found in examining scholarly work in preparation for this symposium that there has been little done, relatively speaking on 19th-century performance techniques."

Students at the Berkshire Music Center will probably make up the bulk of the auditors. David G. Hughes, chairman of the Music Department of Harvard, will be the chairman. Nathan Broder, the president of the American Musicological Society, is one of those whose topics is already set. He will speak on "Ornamentation in Mozart." Arthur Mendel, chairman of the music department of Princeton, will give a detailed analysis of Bach works for performance purposes. Donald Mintz of Washington will speak on "The Sketches and Published Scores of the Mendelssohn "Italian Symphony." Martin Bernstein, Elliot Forbes, Paul Henry Lang, Jan La Rue and Nicholas Slonimsky will be among the other speakers. July 13, 14 and 15 will be the dates of the discussions.

REASSURANCE

On April 1, three days before his eighty-ninth birthday, Pierre Monteux slipped from the podium at the Santa Cecilia Academy in Rome. What made the situation worse was that he then fell into the pit. But he picked himself up and insisted on completing the concert. Naturally, friends have been anxious. Recognizing this might be so, Doris Monteux, the conductor's wife, waited until two days after the birthday, and then, when she saw all was well, sent the following cable to Nora Shea of Columbia Artists Management:

"Maestro is fine. Concert television Milano tenth. Don't worry, Nora. Love, Doris."

HONOLULU

Hawaii has had a festival devoted to creative works of this century since 1957. It has been growing larger each year. Marion Kerr began it at the Punahou School and at first it was devoted only to music. The scope increased when it moved to the University of Hawaii. A year or two later in 1961, the then new East-West Center entered the picture. This year it will be a festival of music and art, for the Honolulu Academy of Arts has become an assisting element. Next year the festival is expected to increase still more, with the participation of the Honolulu Symphony. The artists being lionized this year will be the composers, John Cage and Toru Takemitsu, and the print-makers, Antonio Frasconi and Kiyoshi Saito. The week-long festival begins next Sunday.

HEMIDEMISEMIQUAVERS

Serge Fournier, French conductor, who was a guest conductor of the Toledo Orchestra this season, has been given a two-year contract as its music director. He starts in October. . . . Friday was the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Eugène d'Albert, Scotch-born composer who wrote the opera "Tiefland." . . . Contemporary Concerts in Chicago will present an all-Stefan Wolpe program on April 24. . . . Lester Trimble will have two New York premier's within three days. Today his Double Concerto for Two Violins, Winds and Brass will be given at "Music in Our Time" and on Tuesday the National Orchestral Association will perform the revised version of his Symphony in Two Movements.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105

Symposium I

Tanglewood Discussions On Performance Practice

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Acting on the belief that the gap between knowledge and practice needs to be closed, Erich Leinsdorf invited 11 musicologists to come to Tanglewood and to participate in a three-day symposium on performance practice.

Six papers were presented: "Problems of the Use of the Continuo in 18th Century Music" (Karl Geiringer); "A Detailed Analysis of Bach's 'Erbarme dich' for performance purposes" (Arthur Mendel); "Ornamentation in Mozart" (Nathan Broder); "Tempo in 1806: A Contemporary Guide" (Jan LaRue); "The Sketches and Published Scores of the Mendelssohn 'Italian Symphony'" (Donald Mintz); and "The Russian Orchestral Sound" (Nicolas Slonimsky). The panel further consisted of David Hughes (chairman), Martin Bernstein, Elliot Forbes, Donald Grout and Paul Henry Lang.

STEINBERG

Arthur Mendel began his remarks by saying, "If anyone here thinks there is only one way to stage 'Hamlet' or only one way to sing 'Erbarme dich' and thinks that I am going to tell him how, will he please leave." That set the tone for much of what went on during the six sessions. It was my impression that many who attended the symposium — including Mr. Harold Schonberg, who gave what seemed like a rather snide account of the event for the New York Times— had come there expecting to be fed answers.

They were not, though the Mendel and Broder sessions presented a fascinating and instructive contrast. They could almost have been purposely scheduled as mutual counterpoises. Mendel concentrated on asking questions, and he often left them unanswered. Broder, by contrast, was comforting to the performers who heard him, for he provided seemingly quite definite answers about the direction of trills or the length of appoggiaturas.

Why this difference? Was it a difference between Bach's time and Mozart, or was it a difference between Mendel and Broder? The Mozart scholar was clearly dealing with a period with fewer and less conflicting sources of information. The late 18th century sources are in agreement with each other quite often, at least much more often than the Baroque sources.

Mendel's approach seemed the more characteristic for the symposium. The question dominated, rather than the answer. Furthermore, Mendel represented the concern with the question, with doubt, with leaving things open, more strongly than any other participant. One result of that was that his paper was in some respects the most stimulating, but it also seemed to be the one that the practical musicians found the most disturbing (the latter being perhaps not unintentional).

Mendel was also the one man to bring up a question of particular moment to the performers for whose benefit the symposium was planned. He asked: "What is the use of studying Bach's performance style- Should we be bound by it?" Over and again he emphasized the necessity for recognizing the difference between a historical judgment and a subjective esthetic one. Just because we know--if we ever can "know"—that Bach in performance did thus and so, is that a reason for today's performer to base his own decision on historical justification rather than on esthetic decision.

The other scholars seemed unwilling to endorse so very liberal an interpretation of the relation between scholarly findings and performing practices. They seemed to prefer the formulation that the performer make his decision by choosing from among the possibilities the scholar offers him. Everyone was inclined to reject a dogmatic approach, but in general there was a strong feeling that performances are best founded upon historical knowledge.

That Mendel was the one most eloquently to doubt the necessity of the historical approach to performance practice was significant and again disturbing. His own scholarship is finely detailed, rigorous in the extreme, and that was obvious even in the relatively informal presentation of his topic.

I recall once hearing Mendel lecture on some extremely complex philological work he was engaged in concerning Bach's St. John Passion. He cited Santayana's injunction, "Show us the work, and leave the date alone", and then went on to a brilliant demonstration of the validity of what must to many have seemed like insanely fussy and detailed scholarship. The point, of course, was to show that without the date, i.e. without the whole historical background, it was not possible for us to be shown the work, to find out how it goes.

Yet how far would Mendel be prepared to go? Would some of the conceivable interpretations of ornaments and their effects on rhythm, melody and harmony, not, modify Bach's thought as much as, say, altering the initial upbeat of "Erbarme dich" from F sharp to G?

We are very fond of assuming that we perform old music "correctly" as opposed to the subjective, modern interpretations characteristic of the 19th century. Yet I have often wondered if our modern search for correctness is not really a highly subjective approach, too, and that some of the objectivity of which we are so proud is a delusion.

I found Mendel's paper, and also Mintz's, which was about the dangers of too literal a belief in the authority of the printed note, unsettling in a most welcome way. It was good that as contrast to the issues of practical detail raised by Geiringer, Broder, and LaRue, there should have been essays that rose from detail to really basic consideration of the nature of the performer's art and responsibilities.

Next week I shall discuss the effect of the symposium in relation to its announced purpose.

The New York Time
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

JUL 19 1964

A SPLIT REDUCED

Musicologists Brought Nearer Performers

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

TANGLEWOOD.

IN a way, performing musicians distrust musicologists almost as much as they distrust critics. They speak different languages. Generally the performing musician is primarily concerned with effect, with over-all line, with architecture, whereas the musicologist is concerned with detail, with niceties, with the apparatus of scholarship. Often the musicologist accuses the musician of being illiterate, insensitive, merely a playing apparatus without brains. And just as often the musician accuses the musicologist of being pedantic, an ivory tower nitpicker out of touch with the practicalities of music.

Last week, for three consecutive days starting Monday, musicologists and musicians came together here at Tanglewood; and if the split was not entirely healed, at least it was reduced a bit.

The idea came from Erich Leinsdorf, who thought it would be a good idea for faculty and students of the Berkshire Music Center to get together with representative American musicologists and trade ideas and experiences.

As a serious practicing musician, Mr Leinsdorf has for some time been concerned about the necessity for musicology to come to the aid of the performer. He outlined some of his ideas a week ago in a short, informal speech to the assembled musicologists. Our young performers, he said, need a great deal of guidance, because today's prevalent instructions to follow the letter of the score "will not do when one tries to master 300 years of music; for during those 300 years, I need not tell you, a lot has changed in the spelling of music, and the same letter meant quite different things in 1750 than it did in 1950."

Last winter Mr. Leinsdorf got in touch with David G. Hughes of Harvard, and Dr. Hughes started to gather a musicological panel. It had been Mr. Leinsdorf's idea to split the discussions between the 18th and 19th centuries, but whereas any number of 18th-century authorities are active in musicological circles, very few specialize in the 19th. As a result the discussions end up slanted more toward the earlier period.

Six Lecturers

Of the 11 musicologists in attendance, six gave lectures. Karl Geiringer of the University of California, Santa Barbara, spoke on problems in the use of the continuo in 18th-century music. Arthur Mendel of Princeton made a detailed analysis of Bach's "Erbarme dich" for performance purposes. Nathan Broder, president of the American Musicological Society, had Mozart ornamentation as his topic, and Jan LaRue of New York University spoke on tempo in 1806. On the final day the two speakers were Donald Mintz, critic of the Evening Star in Washington, and Nicolas Slonimsky of Boston. Mr. Mintz concerned himself with the sketches and public scores of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, and Mr. Slonimsky went into the nature of Russian orchestral sounds.

In addition, there were panel members who made no formal address but who contributed to discussions after each lecture, prompted and urged by Dr. Hughes, the chairman. These were Martin Bernstein of New York University, Donald Grout of Princeton, Paul Henry Lang of Columbia and Elliot Forbes of Harvard.

Papers by Experts

The papers themselves were interesting, coming as they did from experts in the field. But these were less important than the ultimate nature of the message that the specialists offered. And that message was an insistence that there are no musicological rules that will cover all contingencies; that scholarship involves musicianship and common sense as well as research. This sometimes did not sit too well with students and musicians, who would have liked nice, easy answers to their problems. But at least they went away with the understanding that the problems exist and can be solved—perhaps—in one of a number of ways.

The point is that, as Dr. Hughes said, every performer, whether he likes it or not, is a practicing musicologist. He has a musical text to decipher. Intuition can go a long way, but ultimately the performer has to rely on facts. How did Mozart play? What do Bach's tempo indications really mean? How much improvisation is permitted at fermata points in classic scores?

"What may come out," Dr. Hughes said, "is a realization of how complex the problems are, and a realization that the musicologist can offer constructive advice that can help the performer."

Complicating Factor

What has complicated the problem, and what none of the musicologists pointed out —they can be tactful—is that until very recently most practicing musicians had only the vaguest idea of what constituted classic style. Musicology is, after all, one of the most recent of the disciplines. And even today most musicians fight musicological learning because they have been trained in a nonmusicological manner.

Usually the performing musicians and teachers are trained as mechanicians. To vocal or finger technique they bring whatever sensitivity and intuition they are born with. In many cases this is considerable. But they seldom are scholars. On the other hand, musicologists, who have gone thoroughly into old performance practice, almost never have the executive powers of a virtuoso. But they look with dismay on the teaching of the virtuoso, which tends to perpetuate incorrect traditions, usually romantic traditions.

As a result, sensitive students are more and more disturbed. They read musicological studies that often are in complete variance with what their teachers tell them. What to believe?

Doctors Disagree

And, also what to do when the doctors disagree? It was interesting, last week, that in the discussions following each lecture there was some rather violent disagreement among the distinguished panelists. And it was also interesting to observe the attitude of the students, who desperately wanted simple, clear-cut answers to the questions they themselves raised. Clear-cut answers they did not get. If nothing else, though, they went away with one all-encompassing answer supplied by Dr. Mendel.

Some students tried to pin him down on a few of the points he raised.

"Well," Dr. Mendel finally said, "it's a complicated subject. One can make a case for anything. But first you must know the literature of the whole field. Then you are on your own."

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,678

JUL 18 1964

143

Russian Sound - And Critics

By Daniel L. Cusick's

A musicological symposium can be a deadly bore even to musicians unless the lecture either covers a particular field of interest or is presented in the manner in which Nicolai Slonimsky read his paper on "The Russian Orchestral Sound" at Tanglewood this week.

Slonimsky took a wide look at the reason for the interest in his subject rather than trying to become involved with the details of orchestration and the harmonic structure and use of modes. He simple said, "I'm not going to bore you stiff with it."

Instead he examined the public and critical reaction to that readily identifiable sound produced by Russian composers. One of the thoughts which came from the lecture is that neither public nor critics have changed much in their outlooks toward certain music.

Cusick

★ ★ ★

"THE IMPRESSION of barbarity is the first noticeable element in their scores" he said, mentioning a review of the premiere of Tchaikowsky's "Concerto for violin and orchestra" by the great German reviewer, Handslik who called the piece "a work that can stink to the ear."

Today, this concept seems naive, but back then, the impact of the new composition must have been quite another matter. And the same composer's concerto for piano, which Slonimsky jokingly called the "Van Cliburn Concerto" was looked upon as so uncultured that even the Russians, themselves, wouldn't touch it.

Incidentally, America benefitted by this stand-off attitude of the Europeans. The concerto, which is probably the most famous of them all, had its premeire in Boston with Hans von Bulow, a friend of Wagner, at the keyboard.

★ ★ ★

IT WAS thought that Boston would be the best city in which to introduce the concert since "Americans wouldn't know the difference" between a good work and a bad one. But the Boston Evening Transcript reviewer said the work was "as difficult as the name of its composer."

Another Boston critic called the famous "Sixth Symphony" of Tchaikowsky a "foul sewer—vulgar, obscene, abyssmal" and a piece of music which "continues to rot" as it progresses.

We may accept the Russian orchestral sound as a matter of pleasure today, even to the point of seeking it out, but it was only a few years ago, according to Slonimsky, that Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony" was referred to as "an orgy of discordant sounds showing the chaos of the Russian nation." This tame work? But only 40 or so years ago, Stravinsky was being called "fiendish" for his "Sacre du Printemps."

★ ★ ★

THE RUSSIAN sound has some typical features which make it unique. Much of it is somber and written low in the scale. Some of it is produced in the more ancient modal systems, systems which begin on something other than the "do" or "la" to which we are so accustomed now. And, to many, the brilliance of the orchestral writing, alone, is a sign of decadence.

Slominsky pointed up that Russian music was not always in the ensemble virtuoso category that it holds today. Once, the orchestras of the rich landlords were made up of "Johnny one-notes," horn players who could blow only one note on their rustic instruments, but who became famous for just that.

Imagine a modern orchestra approaching a running scale passage which would have each note of that fast sequence played by a different man. The chaos would be overwhelming.

BUT TO the landlords, these men were highly prized and, if one escaped, there would appear in the paper, an advertisment reading: "Missing—one F-sharp from the court orchestra of Grand Duke So-and-So. Also good at barbering and animal tending."

If there is a definite Russian sound, it must be attributed to one man, for the most part. Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov set the standards which have been followed up to the present time. He was the orchestrator of most of Mussorgsky's writings and, though Stravinsky denies it, is the basis for the writings by the creator of "The Firebird" and "The Rite of Spring."

In essence, then, the Russian orchestral sound is the sound of Korsakov. If one is familiar with that, the rest, supposedly, is easy.

England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
178, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105
JUL 26 1964

Symposium II

The Scholars Talked, But Who Was Listening?

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Much of the musicologists' talk at the Tanglewood performance practice symposium July 13-15 was good. The question now is, how effective was it?

STEINBERG

As the chairman, Prof. David Hughes of Harvard, pointed out at the beginning, the musicologist and the performer are apt to regard each other as strange sorts of beasts, and each is inclined to be a little suspicious and a bit contemptuous of the other.

The performer likes to have answers, and he wants them in concise, practical terms. Without wanting to be much concerned with background, he wants to know if he is to play loud or soft, long or short, D or C sharp. The musicologists were concerned, and very properly so, with showing that too many imponderables are involved for the situation to become thus simplified. The ratio of answers to questions is not just one to one; the time will not come when the conductor can feed a question on the length of an appoggiatura into his Minivac—one, of course, that has been properly brought up on Quantz, Agricola, and the rest—and get the answer.

Questions, Answers

The performer who looks to the day when all musicological know-how can be reduced into a panacean handbook is perhaps living in a fool's paradise, but the scholar who is too skeptical to believe that he can be of any practical help at all is surely mistaken. Perhaps the most fundamental truth of the symposium lay in Arthur Mendel's closing remark: he had shown how often problems must be solved by analogy, from within the piece if possible, from outside if necessary, and he went on from there to say in effect, "Get to know the whole literature, and then you can be on your own."

That is the best possible advice. It is a terrifying charge, of course, but it needed to be made. In general I found it good that the symposium concentrated so much on questions and on the outlining of problems rather than on handing out answers. The performer's cynical, "If the expert's can't agree why should I bother?" is never far away, and I would add as another basic motto the pitchy summing up by Donald Mintz, "You can't believe everything, but that doesn't mean you can't believe anything."

Having the meetings include panel discussions was an excellent idea. Some of the best, the most clarifying moments came in the discussions after the individual papers had been read. There were questions from the floor also. That is apt to be a risky procedure, but it worked well: there was only a modest amount of foolishness or irrelevance, and much of that was valuable and interesting.

As performers, if I may for a moment thus view them, the panelists were quite variable. Some were articulate and witty, some of them were obviously intensely musical which more than anything else gained them the respects of their audience. One or two were drearily pedantic and paralysingly over-explanatory; a few, determined perhaps to prove to the peasants that scholars are not such dull dogs as is generally supposed, were terribly concerned with being entertainers, no matter how irrelevantly.

Left for Dead

Those of us accustomed to academic congresses were fairly well accustomed to the verbal knifings that took place on stage, though some of the listeners found the assassinations quite disturbing. It also seems to be inevitable at musicological meetings that slide and film projectors should not work properly. That is, however, a bad part of the musicological tradition, and it was distressing that Mintz's lecture on Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony was, in effect, sabotaged because the films were invisible.

Many of the participants felt that the meetings were successful—one pointed out that the discussion was generally at a higher level than at the performance practice panel at the International Musicological Congress in New York three years ago—and I know that I enjoyed most of the meetings and learned something.

That is not the point though. The Mendel and Broder lectures were well attended, but for the others the audience was rather sparse. I saw a notice on the bulletin board to the effect that students at the Berkshire Music Center were required to attend except in the case of direct conflict with rehearsals and classes. Since so few students were there it is necessary to conclude either that nobody bothered to enforce the alleged requirement, or that it was not intelligent to schedule the meetings at times when students would bona fide be kept from attending.

Where Were They?

Of course the faculty did not set a notably good example to the students. Two or three teachers were there quite frequently, another handful put in an occasional brief appearance. I rather got the impression, though, that having made the gesture of inviting the musicologists, the Center was then content to leave matters to themselves.

The world will know of Tanglewood's enlightened gesture in setting up the symposium, and Tanglewood will receive credit. But more important, if less glamorous, achievement would have been that of making sure that the scholars reached the audience of students and teachers for whose benefit they had ostensibly been invited.

I hope the Berkshire Music Center will continue its attempts to establish rapport between the scholars and the performers. It is ideally equipped to do so. But the scholars should not become a mere means of glamorizing Mr. Leinsdorf's enlightened state of mind. If the musicologists are worth inviting at all, and if A.S.C.A.P.'s money is worth spending on such a project, then they should be invited under conditions where they can be effective. The Center's administration must see to it that if the scholars come back, they will not just be talking to themselves.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4220
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304
JUL 14 1964

Musicological Parley Begins at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

There were nine men on the Chamber Music Hall platform at Tanglewood yesterday morning for the beginning of the three-day Musicological Symposium, and they may well have been the supreme court of their vocation.

The Berkshire Music Center received a grant from the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers which made the symposium possible, but it has been the fresh and energetic new spirit that Erich Leinsdorf injected into the school's activities which has sparked, among other things, this phase of education.

Hughes Is Chairman

The chairman of the panel is David G. Hughes of Harvard University. There is to be a morning and afternoon session on each of the first three days of this week. Yesterday, Karl Geiringer of the University of California of Santa Barbara read a paper on the "Problems of the Use of the Continuo in Eighteenth Century Music." In the afternoon Arthur Mendel of Princeton University read on "A Detailed Analysis of Bach's 'Erbame dich' for Performance Purposes."

The little hall was filled for both sessions by other invitees of the symposium, members of the Music Center faculty, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, students of the Center and Friends who have made contributions to the school.

Top Authorities

All six men who have been invited to read papers as well as the other members of the panel are recognized authorities in musicology. Discussion following yesterday's lectures was both lively and informative, and for many of us the depth of research and the penetration of the special focus of their attention were extremely profitable and fascinating.

Both papers yesterday were concerned with practices of 18th century music over which there is still as much variety of opinion and divergence of positions as there is over Shakespeare and his era of the preceding century.

Today's lecturers are Nathan Broder, who is the president of the American Musicological Society, and Jan LaRue of New York University.

4 WEEK CONTEMPORARY MUSIC SEMINAR

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 63,707 SUN. 116,106
JUN 14 1964

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.

Times Union
ALBANY, N. Y.
MAY 31 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 6 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Sunday Republican
Sun. Circ. 112,397
MAY 10 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 6 - 742-4200
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript-Telegram
Eve. Circ. 26,427
MAY 4 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sentinel (e)
FITCHBURG, Mass.
Circ. 17,998
MAY 11 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,787
MAY 7 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111
MAY 7 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302
MAY 3 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
MAY 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAY 4 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
MAY 2 1964

Tanglewood Plans Seminar To Help Music Educators

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will sponsor a four-week Seminar in Contemporary Music for Music Educators from July 27-August 23. The program is designed primarily for selected secondary-school teachers who direct instrumental and/or choral groups in their schools and for music educators at the college level. Scholarships for the Seminar are available to qualified applicants.

Staff Picked

Erich Leinsdorf has announced the following staff for the Seminar in Contemporary Music: Peter Gram Swing and Gunther Schuller, chairmen; Edwin London, instructor in composition; Carl Berky, instructor; and Florence Dunn, administrative assistant. In addition the following faculty from the various departments of the Berkshire Music Center will be participating teachers: Mr. Schuller, composition; Lorna Cooke deVaron and Alfred Nash Patterson, choral music; William Gibson, Eugen Lehner, Sherman Walt and George Zazofsky, chamber music.

The schedule of activities will include lectures, class discussions, observation of rehearsals, composition classes and performance workshops. All will be two-hour sessions, with two sessions each day, Monday through Friday. Evenings will be free for attending concerts.

Formal lectures will deal with broad topics such as the cultural framework of the 20th Century; the general question of aesthetics in music; key composers such as Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Varese, etc.; analysis of individual compositions, particularly works to be performed at Tanglewood.

Classes

Composition classes will deal with traditional and contemporary techniques. The performance workshops will include chamber music and choral music. There will also be regular attendance at the Composition Department seminars and rehearsals of the Fromm Fellows, and participation in the Festival Chorus, preparing a contemporary work for performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a Berkshire Festival concert.

During the four-week period of the seminar a total of 12 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and 25 concerts by members of the Berkshire Music Center are scheduled, to all of which members will be admitted.

The Berkshire Music Center, which is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, has received a grant from the MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education in support of this program. The grant is part of a six-year project which began in July 1963 under a grant of $1,380,000 to the Music Educators National Conference from the Ford Foundation.

Inquiries regarding applications should be addressed to: Harry J. Kraut, Administrator, Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, 02115.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209
JAN 18 1964

Teachers' Seminar In Modern Music For Tanglewood

A four-week seminar in contemporary music for music educators will be held at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, this summer, it was announced today.

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Center and music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said the Center has received a grant of $8,000 from the MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education to support the program. It is expected that about 30 teachers of music will enroll in the program which will acquaint them with the latest techniques, principles and composition problems in contemporary music.

Mr. Leinsdorf also announced plans for the Music Center's department of composition for the Center's 1964 season, running from June 28 to Aug. 23, while the Boston Symphony' Orchestra's Berkshire Festival is taking place at Tanglewood.

He said Aaron Copland will continue as head of the department and chairman of the faculty of the Center but will be in residence only Aug. 3-16. Gunther Schuller of New York City, American composer, will be the acting head of the department when Mr. Copland is not present. Other members of the composition department faculty include Pierre Boulez, French composer; Lukas Foss, music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic, and Paul Jacobs, teacher of contemporary keyboard performance technique. Mr. Foss will be in residence only Aug. 1-23.

The faculty will conduct seminars and give individual instruction to young composers. They will participate also in the festival of contemporary music, scheduled for Aug. 9-13, with the co-operation of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Ten young American composers whose works will be performed during the festival will be in residence at Tanglewood July 27-Aug. 13.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
BRISTOL, CONN.
Press
Eve. Circ. 14,611
JUL 24 1964

At Tanglewood

Contemporary Music Fest

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Erich Leinsdorf, director, will sponsor a four-week Seminar in Contemporary Music for Music Educators from July 27 to August 23.

The program is designed primarily for selected secondary-school teachers who direct instrumental and/or choral groups in their schools, and for music educators at the college level. Scholarships for the seminar were awarded to qualified applicants.

Mr. Leinsdorf has announced the following staff for the seminar: Peter Gram Swing and Gunther Schuller, chairmen; Edwin London, instructor in composition; Carl Berky, instructor; and Florence Dunn, administrative assistant. In addition, the following faculty from the various departments of the Berkshire Music Center will be participating teachers: Mr. Schuller, composition; Lorna Cooke deVaron and Alfred Nash Patterson, choral music; William Gibson, Eugen Lehner, Sherman Walt and George Zazofsky, chamber music.

Well Rounded Schedule

The schedule of activities will include lectures, class discussions, observation of rehearsals, composition classes and performance workshops. All will be two-hour sessions, with two sessions each day, Monday through Friday. Evenings will be free for attending concerts.

Formal lectures will deal with broad topics such as the cultural framework of the 20th century; the general question of aesthetics in music; key composers such as Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Varese, etc.; analysis of individual compositions, particularly works to be performed at Tanglewood.

Composition classes will deal with traditional and contemporary techniques. The performance workshops will include chamber music and choral music. There will also be regular attendance at the composition department seminars and rehearsals of the Fromm Fellows, and participation in the Festival Chorus, preparing a contemporary work for performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a Berkshire Festival concert.

Concerts Open to Members

During the four-week period of the seminar a total of 12 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and 25 concerts by members of the Berkshire Music Center are scheduled, to all of which members will be admitted.

The Berkshire Music Center, which is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, has received a grant from the MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education in support of this program. The grant is part of a six-year project which began in July 1963 under a grant of $1,380,000 to the Music Educators National Conference from the Ford Foundation.

ILLINOIS EDUCATION
SPRINGFIELD, ILL.
MONTHLY 64,400
MAR 1964

Music Seminars at Aspen, Tanglewood

The Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education, conducted by the Music Educators National Conference, announces two grants for seminars in contemporary music for the summer of 1964. Recipients are the Aspen Music School, Aspen, Colo., and the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass. The grants were approved as part of the six-year project which began in July, 1963, under a grant of $1,380,000 to MENC from the Ford Foundation.

Aspen Music School will have a nine-weeks course in contemporary music from June 22 to Aug. 23. The course will emphasize the techniques, analysis, and performance of contemporary music through lectures, laboratory rehearsals, performance, and listening experiences. Twenty music educators will be selected as participants on the basis of applications, professional qualifications, and experience. Graduate credit for the course will be available through the University of Colorado. Inquiries should be addressed to: James N. Cain, Executive Director, Music Associates of Aspen, 111 West 57th Street, New York.

Berkshire Music Center will receive funds for a four-weeks workshop for 30 music educators July 27 to Aug. 25. Emphasis will be on techniques and styles, performance problems, and evaluation and understanding through listening. The workshop format will include lectures, laboratory rehearsals, and performance. Send inquiries to Harry J. Kraut, Administrator, Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

The Contemporary Music Project also provides for fellowships to young composers to reside in public school systems, which will begin this September, and pilot projects in selected public schools.

ROOSEVELT PRESS
Thursday, June 4, 1964

ROOSEVELT SCHOOL NEWS

ROOSEVELT PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Dr. Irwin Swack, a member of the music faculty of the Roosevelt Public Schools has recently been awarded a fellowship to study at the Berkshire Music Center, at Tanglewood Lenox, Mass.

The Music Educators National Conference Music Project for Creativity in Music Education is offering a seminar at the Berkshire Music Center for the 1964 season.

The seminar is part of a six-year project which began in July 1963 under a grant to the MENC from the Ford Foundation. The program is under the direction of Gunther Schuller, head of the department of composition and will be assisted by other members of the faculty.

4 Week Contemporary Music Seminar

145

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106

JUN 14 1964

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923

JUN 13 1964

The Indianapolis Times
D. 87,875 SUN. 99,455

MAY 17 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 6 - 742-4200

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Sunday Republican
Sun. Circ. 114,397

MAY 10 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 6 - 742-4200

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript-Telegram
Eve. Circ. 26,427

MAY 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sentinel (e)
FITCHBURG, Mass.
Circ. 17,998

MAY 11 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,787

MAY 7 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111

MAY 7 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302

MAY 3 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819

MAY 10 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

MAY 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

MAY 2 1964

Tanglewood Plans Seminar To Help Music Educators

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will sponsor a four-week Seminar in Contemporary Music for Music Educators from July 27-August 23. The program is designed primarily for selected secondary-school teachers who direct instrumental and/or choral groups in their schools and for music educators at the college level. Scholarships for the Seminar are available to qualified applicants.

Staff Picked

Erich Leinsdorf has announced the following staff for the Seminar in Contemporary Music: Peter Gram Swing and Gunther Schuller, chairmen; Edwin London, instructor in composition; Carl Berky, instructor; and Florence Dunn, administrative assistant. In addition the following faculty from the various departments of the Berkshire Music Center will be participating teachers: Mr. Schuller, composition; Lorna Cooke deVaron and Alfred Nash Patterson, choral music; William Gibson, Eugen Lehner, Sherman Walt and [illegible] Zazofsky, chamber music.

The schedule of activities will include lectures, class discussions, observation of rehearsals, composition classes and performance workshops. All will be two-hour sessions, with two sessions each day, Monday through Friday. Evenings will be free for attending concerts.

Formal lectures will deal with broad topics such as the cultural framework of the 20th Century; the general question of aesthetics in music; key composers such as Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Varese, etc.; analysis of individual compositions, particularly works to be performed at Tanglewood.

Classes

Composition classes will deal with traditional and contemporary techniques. The performance workshops will include chamber music and choral music. There will also be regular attendance at the Composition Department seminary and rehearsals of the Fromm Fellows, and participation in the Festival Chorus, preparing a contemporary work for performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a Berkshire Festival concert.

During the four-week period of the seminar a total of 12 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and 25 concerts by members of the Berkshire Music Center are scheduled, to all of which members will be admitted.

The Berkshire Music Center, which is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, has received a grant from the MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education in support of this program. The grant is part of a six-year project which began in July 1963 under a grant of $1,380,000 to the Music Educators National Conference from the Ford Foundation.

Inquiries regarding applications should be addressed to Harry J. Kraut, Administrator, Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209

JAN 18 1964

Teachers' Seminar In Modern Music For Tanglewood

A four-week seminar in contemporary music for music educators will be held at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, this summer, it was announced today.

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Center and music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said the Center has received a grant of $8,000 from the MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education to support the program. It is expected that about 30 teachers of music will enroll in the program which will acquaint them with the latest techniques, principles and composition problems in contemporary music.

Mr. Leinsdorf also announced plans for the Music Center's department of composition for the Center's 1964 season, running from June 28 to Aug. 23, while the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival is taking place at Tanglewood.

He said Aaron Copland will continue as head of the department and chairman of the faculty of the Center but will be in residence only Aug. 3-16. Gunther Schuller of New York City, American composer, will be the acting head of the department when Mr. Copland is not present. Other members of the composition department faculty include Pierre Boulez, French composer; Lukas Foss, music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic, and Paul Jacobs, teacher of contemporary keyboard performance technique. Mr. Foss will be in residence only Aug. 1-23.

The faculty will conduct seminars and give individual instruction to young composers. They will participate also in the festival of contemporary music, scheduled for Aug. 9-13, with the co-operation of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Ten young American composers whose works will be performed during the festival will be in residence at Tanglewood July 27-Aug. 13.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BRISTOL, CONN.
Press
Eve. Circ. 14,611

JUL 24 1964

At Tanglewood

Contemporary Music Fest

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Erich Leinsdorf, director, will sponsor a four-week Seminar in Contemporary Music for Music Educators from July 27 to August 23.

The program is designed primarily for selected secondary-school teachers who direct instrumental and/or choral groups in their schools, and for music educators at the college level. Scholarships for the seminar were awarded to qualified applicants.

Mr. Leinsdorf has announced the following staff for the seminar: Peter Gram Swing and Gunther Schuller, chairmen; Edwin London, instructor in composition; Carl Berky, instructor; and Florence Dunn, administrative assistant. In addition, the following faculty from the various departments of the Berkshire Music Center will be participating teachers: Mr. Schuller, composition; Lorna Cooke deVaron and Alfred Nash Patterson, choral music; William Gibson, Eugen Lehner, Sherman Walt and George Zazofsky, chamber music.

Well Rounded Schedule

The schedule of activities will include lectures, class discussions, observation of rehearsals, composition classes and performance workshops. All will be two-hour sessions, with two sessions each day, Monday through Friday. Evenings will be free for attending concerts.

Formal lectures will deal with broad topics such as the cultural framework of the 20th century; the general question of aesthetics in music; key composers such as Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Varese, etc.; analysis of individual compositions, particularly works to be performed at Tanglewood.

Composition classes will deal with traditional and contemporary techniques. The performance workshops will include chamber music and choral music. There will also be regular attendance at the composition department seminars and rehearsals of the Fromm Fellows and participation in the Festival Chorus, preparing a contemporary work for performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a Berkshire Festival concert.

Concerts Open to Members

During the four-week period of the seminar a total of 12 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and 25 concerts by members of the Berkshire Music Center are scheduled, to all of which members will be admitted.

The Berkshire Music Center, which is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, has received a grant from the MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education in support of this program. The grant is part of a six-year project which began in July 1963 under a grant of $1,380,000 to the Music Educators National Conference from the Ford Foundation.

ILLINOIS EDUCATION
SPRINGFIELD, ILL.
MONTHLY 64,400

MAR 1964

Music Seminars at Aspen, Tanglewood

The Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education, conducted by the Music Educators National Conference, announces two grants for seminars in contemporary music for the summer of 1964. Recipients are the Aspen Music School, Aspen, Colo., and the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass. The grants were approved as part of the six-year project which began in July, 1963, under a grant of $1,380,000 to MENC from the Ford Foundation.

Aspen Music School will have a nine-weeks course in contemporary music from June 22 to Aug. 23. The course will emphasize the techniques, analysis, and performance of contemporary music through lectures, laboratory rehearsals, performance, and listening experiences. Twenty music educators will be selected as participants on the basis of applications, professional qualifications, and experience. Graduate credit for the course will be available through the University of Colorado. Inquiries should be addressed to: James N. Cain, Executive Director, Music Associates of Aspen, 111 West 57th Street, New York.

Berkshire Music Center will receive funds for a four-weeks workshop for 30 music educators July 27 to Aug. 25. Emphasis will be on techniques and styles, performance problems, and evaluation and understanding through listening. The workshop format will include lectures, laboratory rehearsals, and performance. Send inquiries to Harry J. Kraut, Administrator, Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

The Contemporary Music Project also provides for fellowships to young composers to reside in public school systems, which will begin this September, and pilot projects in selected public schools.

ROOSEVELT PRESS
Thursday, June 4, 1964

ROOSEVELT SCHOOL NEWS

ROOSEVELT PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Dr. Irwin Swack, a member of the music faculty of the Roosevelt Public Schools has recently been awarded a fellowship to study at the Berkshire Music Center, at Tanglewood Lenox, Mass.

The Music Educators National Conference Music Project for Creativity in Music Education is offering a seminar at the Berkshire Music Center for the 1964 season.

The seminar is part of a six-year project which began in July 1963 under a grant to the MENC from the Ford Foundation. The program is under the direction of Gunther Schuller, head of the department of composition and will be assisted by other members of the faculty.

BLANK PAGE

STRING SYMPOSIUM.

'47

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 47,923

AUG 1 4 1964

String Symposium Set at Tanglewood

The Berksire Music Center will hold its second annual string symposium Sunday and Monday at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

The symposium will be attended by teachers and instrumentalists from throughout the United States. Its purpose will be to focus attention on the shortage of string instrumentalists in this country. and to offer suggestions toward solving the problem.

Three meetings, open to faculty and participants at the center and to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, will be held in the chamber music hall at 8 p.m. on Sunday and at 2:30 and 8 p.m. on Monday.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ATHENS HERALD
Thursday, August 13, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

FLATBUSH LIFE
August 8, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

GREENVILLE LOCAL
Wednesday, August 12, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

CAIRO HERALD
Thursday, August 13, 1964

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FLATBUSH LIFE
W. 15,500

AUG 8 1964

GREENVILLE, N. Y.
LOCAL
W. 500

AUG 1 2 1964

St. Louis
Globe-Democrat
D. 295,004 SUN. 355,183

AUG 2 2 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193

AUG 4 1964

CAIRO, N. Y.
HERALD
W. 300

AUG 1 3 1964

The Ann Arbor News
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
D. 30,000

AUG 1 7 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,499

AUG 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,439

AUG 7 1964

String Symposium Set At Tanglewood Aug. 16

For the second time in two years some of the nation's finest and best known string players and teachers will come to Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass, for a two-day String Symposium August 16-17.

This meeting is designed to focus further attention on the severe string instrumentalist shortage facing music in the United States, to offer positive suggestions toward solution of the problem, and to create increased awareness for the need of an active program dealing with the situation. The symposium this year is the outgrowth and continuation of a similar meting held at Tanglewood in 1963, and many of the participants from last year's sessions will be on hand for the August mettings.

Burgin Opens Program

This year's symposium will be opened by Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concertmaster for 42 years until his retirement in 1962. Mr. Burgin is also Head of the Berkshire Music Center's Department of Instrumental Music. Following Mr. Burgin's introduction, the symposium will be addressed by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony and director of the Berkshire Music Center. Louis Krasner of Syracuse University is chariman of this year's session of the String Symposium.

Mr. Krasner has announced three meetings for the symposium beginning at 8 p.m. Sunday, August 16. The remaining two meetings will be held at 2:30 p.m. and 8 p.m. Monday, August 17. All meetings will be held in the Chamber Music Hall at Tanglewood. Monday's initial session, following the opening remarks, will be addressed by four participants.

Speakers Topics

Max Kaplan, musician and sociologist, is scheduled to talk on "The Image of and Climate for the String Instrument Student." In this same sphere of social background, Sheppard Lehnoff of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra will speak on "Developing Greater Family Interest in Studying Stringed Instruments and the Role of the Family." Two other participants, Joseph Knitzer, Eastman School of Music, and Broadus Erle, Yale School of Music, will discuss the Early Training of String Players. Mr. Knitzer's topic is "The Need, Value, and Availability of Expert Training from an early age through High School," and Mr. Erle's subject is to be "Pre-Instrumental Training in Solfege and Other Note-reading Techniques."

The afternoon meeting August 17 will include two broad topics, Status and Economic Picture, and University, College, Conservatory Curricula and Teacher Training. Sidney Harth, Carnegie Institute of Technology, will deliver a paper on "Security and Recognition for the Orchestra Player," and Howard Boatwright, Syracuse University, will discuss "Some Implications of the United States Department of Education Seminar at Yale University, 1963." In the educational category of the August 17 afternoon session, Samuel Applebaum, Manhattan School of Music, will speak on "Improvement of Class Methods," and "A Recommended Instrumental and Academic Program; the Role of Music Education" will be the topic of a paper by Allen Britton of the University of Michigan.

Studies In Training

At the evening session on August 17 three papers will be delivered in the area of techniques and advanced training. "Modernization of Existing Materials for Intermediate Students" will be the subject of Joseph Silverstein's paper. Mr. Silverstein is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and associate head of the Berkshire Music Center's Department of Instrumental Music. His colleague at the Music Center, William Kroll, founder of the Kroll Quartet, will speak on "Introduction to Ensemble Playing." Joseph Gingold, Indiana University, will talk on "Improving Practice Habits and Preparation of the Advanced Student for Professional Involvement."

Following the delivery of the prepared papers there will be free discussion among the speakers, symposium participants, and members of the audience. In addition to those already mentioned, the string symposium participants will include Orlando Cole, Curtis Institute of Music; Ruth Posselt, Berkshire Music Center faculty; Paul Rolland, president of the American String Teachers Association; Theo Salzman, Carnegie Institute of Technology; Henri Temianka, University of California; and Roman Totenberg, Boston University.

Grant Aids Symposium

The Berkshire Music Center, sponsor of the string sypmosium sessions of 1963 and this year, has invited as observers Robert Klotman of the Board of Education, Akron, Ohio and Harold Arberg, music education specialist of the United States Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

A grant from the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, Inc. has aided the Music Center in making this symposium possible.

The three sessions of the 1964 String Symposium at Tanglewood are open to the facutly and participants of the Berkshire Music Center and the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Monday, August 3, 1964

Watertown Daily Times
WATERTOWN, N. Y.

AUG 1 5 1964

CRANE PROFESSOR ATTENDS STRING MUSIC SYMPOSIUM

Potsdam, Aug. 15. — Prof. Maurice H. Baritaud of Potsdam State University college is one of a number of musicians and music educators attending a special string symposium Sunday and Monday at the Berkshire Music center, Tanglewood, Mass.

The symposium will be under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Professor Baritaud is coordinator of strings in the college's Crane department of music and is conductor of the Crane Symphony orchestra.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2073, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

QUINCY, MASS.
Patriot-Ledger
Eve. Circ. 48,932

AUG 4 1964

String-Playing Is Berkshire Topic

The severe shortage of orchestral stringplayers in the United States is the subject of a three-pare Berkshire Music Festival symposium Sunday and Monday, Aug. 16 and 17. The meetings will include the reading of formal papers on a problem that is plaguing America's symphony orchestras and its possible solutions, followed by informal discussions.

Participants Sunday include Max Kaplan sociologist; Sheppard Lehnhoff, of the Chicago Symphony; Joseph Knitzer, of the Eastman School of Music, and Broadus Erle of the Yale School of Music. They are scheduled to address themselves to the techniques of recruiting young musicians to string playing.

The Monday afternoon symposium is designed to sketch the economic and educational picture for string players, their teachers and schools. Monday evening, guest speakers will discuss the training of musicians, with special emphasis on advanced work, such as ensemble playing.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the BSO, will offer some opening remarks at the Sunday session, then yield the podium in the chamber music hall to Louis Krasner, of Syracuse University, chairman of the symposium.

143

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
AUG 4 1964

Speakers, Topics Listed For String Symposium

Teachers and players of stringed instruments will meet at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox for a two-day symposium Aug. 16-17 on the string shortage faced by American orchestras. A similiar symposium was held last Summer at the scool for advanced study of music, maintained at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Louis Krasner of Syracuse University will be chairman of this year's meeting. Discussion will follow each lecture. The sessions are open to music center students, faculty and friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Speakers and topics follow:

Aug. 16 at 8 p.m. Opening address by Richard Burgin, former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony; speech by Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony conductor and music center director; Max Kaplan, musicologist and sociologist, on "The Image and Climate for the String Instrument Student;" Sheppard Lehnhoff, Chicago Symphony, on "Developing Greater Family Interest in Studying Stringed Instruments and the Role of the Family;" Joseph Knitzer, Eastman School of Music, on "The Need, Value and Availability of Expert Training from an Early Age through High School;" and Music, on "Pre-Instrumental Training in Solfege and Other Note-Reading Techniques."

Aug. 17 at 2:30 p.m. Sidney Harth, Carnegie Institute of Technology, Pittsburgh, on "Security and Recognition for the Orchestra Player;" Howard Boatwright, Syracuse University, "Some Implications of the United States Department of Education Seminar at Yale University, 1963;" Samuel Applebaum, Manhattan School of Music, on "Improvement of Class Methods;" and Allen Britton, University of Michigan, "A Recommended Instrumental and Academic Program —the Role of Music Education."

Aug. 17 at 8 p.m. Joseph Silverstein, B.S.O. concertmaster, on "Modernization of Existing Materials for Intermediate Students;" William Kroll, founder of the Kroll Quartet, on "Introduction to Ensemble Playing;" and Joseph Gingold, Indiana Universtiy, on "Improving Practice Habits and Preparation of the Advanced Student for Professional Involvement."

In addition to those already mentioned, the string symposium participants will include Orlando Cole, Curtis Institute Broadus Erle, Yale School of Music; Ruth Posselt, Berkshire Music Center faculty; Paul Rolland, president of the American String Teachers Assn.; Theo Salzman, Carnegie Institute of Technology; Henri Temianka, University of California; and Roman Totenberg, Boston University.

THE STATE JOURNAL
LANSING, MICH.
D. 70,182 SUN. 69,552
AUG 2 3 1964

MUSIC

Music Education Gets Going-Over At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, Mass. — A severe string instrumentalist shortage faces music in the United States, according to Allen P. Britton, associate dean in the University of Michigan School of Music.

"There is an idea prevalent on both the east and west coasts to the effect that musicians should not be educated in college and university departments in schools of music," Dean Britton said, speaking at the String Symposium at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., last Monday.

"The idea stems from the belief that musicians may be trained properly only in institutions bearing the name conservatory, and, further, that no institution bearing the name conservatory can be a part of any institution bearing the name university," he said.

PREVALENT IDEA

Dean Britton also criticized the prevalent idea that the education of the "music educator" needs to be significantly different from that of the professional performer.

"It seems to me that all musicians should receive a generally similar type of education, and one which would allow them to become professional performers or teachers.

"The high disdain for music education often expressed by musicians stems in part from the fact that some music educators are not as good musicians as one might wish," said Dean Britton.

He noted that string instruments are much more difficult to learn to play than any other instruments. "String players have tended to paint themselves into a corner on this matter," he said. "They have succeeded in convincing everyone that wind instruments are more easily learned than string instruments."

STRING PLAYERS

He pointed out that the U.S. demands and can support a considerable number of string players. He referred especially to the large number of positions available in the public schools and in colleges and universities.

"The latter positions particularly provide stable and good income while at the same time allowing for a considerable amount of personal satisfaction in the kind of work one can do and in the kind of community prestige one can enjoy."

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 417,195
AUG 3 0 1964

Music

Help for Strings

By ALAN BRANIGAN

Outside on the lawn at Tanglewood, a cosmopolitan crowd listened as Seiji Ozawa led the Boston Symphony in Hindesmith's "Mathis der Maler" and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The music, carried on zephyrs from the immense shed, spread across the beautiful hillside of the Berkshire Music Center and only vaguely reached a small room where some musicians sat huddled over a vexatious problem.

The two events were connected in more ways than just geographically. The Boston's superb strings soared with unlimited finesse, but where are the strings of the next generation? This is the puzzle that confronted the fellows back in the office. Something, however, was being done about it, and it happened immediately after the Ozawa program had ended in a blaze of glory.

This was the mid-August String Symposium, made up of experts gathered from all over the United States under the sponsorship of the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music at the invitation of Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony. The Berkshire Music Center served as host and office staff, directed by Harry A. Kraut. This reporter was on hand as an invited observer.

The list of experts was imposing. Heading the roster was Louis Krasner of Syracuse University as chairman. Present on the panel were such luminaries as Richard Burgin, Joseph Knitzer, Joseph Gingold, Theo Salzman, Ruth Posselt, Broadus Earle, Henri Temianka, Howard Boatright, Roman Totenberg, New Jersey's Samuel Applebaum, Orlando Cole, Joseph Silvestein, the Boston's concertmaster, and William Kroll, altogether a thoughtful and representative delegation from the string fraternity.

Manifold Problem

During four ensuing sessions, the sole subject was the severe shortage of string instrumentalists. Many aspects of the problem were presented, from the predominance of girl violin students, to the endless bickering between educators about applied music vs. theoretical music.

From the start, it was obvious that although the experts had a common interest in the problem and its ramifications there was no ready-made solution on tap. Many cited the immense drop-out rate among young violinists as homework intrudes on practice periods. Others mentioned teachers whose narrow-minded clinging to a single system of teaching, instead of treating each child as an individual, drove many away from instruments they loved. There was also a strong case made for the career as teacher in the public schools as contrasted with the hit-or-miss existence of those who chose to become professional players.

The chief gain, to this observer, occurred during the final session. During the dinners and parties associated with the symposium, all sorts of helpful solutions were proposed. One of the most useful came from Temianka, who is first violin of the Stradivari Quartet and professor at University of California. Temianka's plan involved the formation of a national committee to set standards, encourage the visits of expert string players to deprived areas and generally to protect and encourage the young who play violins, violas, cellos and double basses.

The proposal, voiced at the session, called attention in a most impressive way to one of the panelists who had been a latecomer to the expert list but who proved to be a fine spokesman for the profession. This panelist was Paul Rolland, professor at University of Illinois and president of the American String Teachers' Association, a group with several thousand members on the nationwide scale.

Large Task

By an enthusiastic majority, Rolland and the ASTA were given the task of organizing string teaching, progress, standards and methods for the greatest good of the profession. It is an immense task, which probably can succeed only through foundation assistance.

Involved in it are the need to combine many musicians of temperamental nature into a common cause agreeable to all and to present this new and encouraging philosophy to young players. The status of the string player in our competitive society doubtless will figure in this enterprise as well as the shaky economic future that many players encounter.

The meeting as a whole had an important bearing on the future of culture in America. The symphonic orchestra today is the central musical element in the nation, and the central task of the symphony is undertaken by strings. It is of paramount importance that a sufficient number of these players be prepared for future work as today's players retire and as the number of symphony orchestras increases. If a national committee bent on improving matters is the solution, then all the work and worry of the symposium will have been well worth while.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 •
Christian
Monito
BOSTON
Circ. 17
FEB 1 5

War

By Myr
Written for The Chr

There is a string player educators say professional Some conduc formers have on this point, Eric Leinsdorf of the Boston chestra.

He felt s about it to h Symphony sp symposium w Tanglewood Since worksh posiums hav clearinghouse experts opinio the views of lic school tea tention of t Leinsdorf in sional teache ers to act as

Eric L

Tanglewood string teache England cons flocks at the hall to hear nationally at nized author dorf deliver the first of with some "Something getic has to focus on aw difference of He discount status of m vant to the p templated th vertising tec pressionable The meth vertisers we it be known the answers, panelists to

SYRA
Herald
D. 132
MAR 2 5

Krasn Edits

Louis Krasn and member Syracuse Uni Music, has e called "Strin ers and Pau Krasner, w master of S has included cussions and from the Ta Symposia o which he pa page bookle Published Music Cent the booklet reasons fo players, im nomic stan vanced tra courage ta consider st ing as a c The Sch Howard Bo pated in t

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB

Wanted: string players

By Myrian Baker
Women's Editor of The Christian Science Monitor

There is a dearth of good string players, most music educators say, at least in the professional field of music. Some conductors and performers have been vociferous on this point, too, among them Eric Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He felt strongly enough about it to have the Boston Symphony sponsor a string symposium which was held at Tanglewood last August. Since workshops and symposiums have been good clearinghouses for airing the experts opinions and bringing the views of private and public school teachers to the attention of the experts, Mr. Leinsdorf invited 14 professional teachers and performers to act as panelists.

Eric Leinsdorf

Tanglewood students and string teachers around New England congregated in large flocks at the chamber music hall to hear the judgments of nationally attuned and recognized authorities. Mr. Leinsdorf delivered a prelude to the first of three meetings with some vivid phrases. "Something radical and energetic has to be done. Let us focus on awakening the indifference of young people." He discounted the economic status of musicians as relevant to the problem, and contemplated the impact of advertising techniques on an impressionable public.

The methods of piano advertisers were noted. He let it be known he did not have the answers, but he asked the panelists to go to work and unearth some leads that would at least touch the core of the string dearth. There would be another symposium next summer, and perhaps the next and next—until results came into view.

Richard Burgin head of Tanglewood's instrumental music department and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, moderated. The opening meeting consisted of each panelist coming to the fore and stating his opinions for the dearth, and in some instances, his own solutions. But the approach to this first symposium didn't really settle down until the second meeting as audience and panel alike began to feel a togetherness, a unifying path down which all participants might walk and talk in the context of the problem as Mr. Leinsdorf envisions it.

The final meeting came off as a question and answer affair. Mr. Burgin projected questions, and answers were juggled back and forth between panelists.

Max Oronoff

The panelists included Max Aronoff, Director of the New School of Music and violist of the Curtis String Quartet; Anshel Brusilow, concertmaster of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Stuart Canin, violin teacher, Oberlin Conservatory; Rafael Druian, concertmaster of the Cleveland Symphony; Broadus Earle, Yale University violin professor; Sydney Harth, department of music, Carnegie Institute of Technology; Louis Krasner, dept. of music at the University of Syracuse; Theo Salzman, principal cellist, Pittsburgh Symphony; Henry Siegl, concertmaster of the Seattle Symphony; Samuel Gardner, private teacher in New York City; Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; William Kroll of the Kroll Quartet, and Sheppard Lehnhoff of the Chicago Symphony.

Here are some reasons given for the string famine:

- Poor teachers at the elementary school level,
- Fallacious method books for beginners,
- Class string teaching,
- Lack of family cultural background,
- Low economic status of musicians (essentially in symphony orchestras),
- Wrong values taught (music is a language, not a skill).

Panaceas

Two lines of thought seemed to prevail—one, that the problem is economic, contrary to Mr. Leinsdorf's opinion, the other, that if the cultural climate and teaching methods were improved, the problem would be eased.

Some panaceas were offered. Having the parents attend the pupil's lesson was one. Others were improving the image of the musician by public relations procedures, sponsoring junior symphonies and showing interest (by the symphony orchestra) in their cities' music problems, string congresses where 100 young musicians gather annually to perform, and videotaping lessons given by the finest teachers for closed circuit viewing by string teachers.

One young Tanglewood student evidently destined for an orchestral career challenged the concertmasters, "How do you expect us to aspire to symphony jobs when we see orchestra violinists bored with making music? After they sit in a string section for 20 years, no player wants to teach music, let alone play it."

The motive must be right, Mr. Druian said in essence. If a musician treasures great music, no matter what his role or in what orchestra he plays, he won't be bored.

Mr. Leinsdorf ended the conclave by announcing another symposium to be held next summer. Several panelists received projects to research during the year.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
MAR 25 1965

Krasner Edits Book

Louis Krasner, noted violinist and member of the faculty of Syracuse University's School of Music, has edited a new book called "String Problems, Players and Paucity."

Krasner, who is also concertmaster of Syracuse Symphony, has included papers, panel discussions and recommendations from the Tanglewood String Symposia of 1963 and 1964, in which he participated, in the 98-page booklet.

Published by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the booklet focuses on social reasons for the shortage of players, improvements of economic standards early and advanced training and way to encourage talented youngsters to consider string instrument playing as a career.

The School of Music Dean Howard Boatwright also participated in the symposia.

THE POST-STANDARD
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
D. 100,052 SUN. 163,341
MAR 25 1965

SU Prof Edits Music Booklet

Louis Krasner, professor of violin at Syracuse University, is editor of a new booklet, "String Problems, Players and Paucity."

Published by the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., in cooperation with Syracuse University's School of Music, it includes papers, panel discussions and recommendations from the Tanglewood String Symposia of 1963 and 1964.

CORTLAND, N. Y.
STANDARD
D. 10,000
APR 7 1965

KRASNER HAS PART IN TANGLEWOOD TEXT

String Problems: Players and Faculty, a transcript of the Tanglewood String Symposia of 1963 and 1964, has recently been published by the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer educational center for the advanced study of music. The 98-page document contains the complete text of the 1964 symposium and extracts from the session of 1963. Publication was made possible through the assistance of the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, Inc.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony and director of the Music Center, invited leading string players and teachers to Tanglewood in the summers of 1963 and 1964 to discuss the pressing problems caused by the shortage of string players. In addition to the transcripts of the symposia, the publication contains "Recommendations and Outlook," "Notes on the Participants and Observers," a "Foreword" by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and an "Introduction" by Louis Krasner, concertmaster of the Syracuse Symphony, who served as chairman of the two Symposia and editor of String Problems, Players and Faculty.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 28,717
APR 17 1965

String Symposia Published

"String Problems: Players and Paucity," a transcript of the Tanglewood String Symposia of 1963 and 1964, has recently been published by the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer educational center for the advanced study of music. The 98-page document contains the complete text of the 1964 symposium and extracts from the session of 1963. Publication was made possible through the assistance of the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, Inc.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony and director of the music center, invited leading string players and teachers to Tanglewood in the summers of 1963 and 1964 to discuss the pressing problems caused by the shortage of string players.

In addition to the transcripts of the symposia, the publication contains "Recommendations and Outlook," "Notes on the Participants and Observers," a foreword by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and an introduction by Louis Krasner, chairman of the two symposia and editor of "String Problems."

Copies of the publication may be obtained by sending a check or money order for $1 to the Syracuse University Press, Box 87, University Station, Syracuse, N. Y. 13210.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240
APR 6 1965

Tanglewood String Problems Published

"String Problems: Players and Paucity," a transcript of the Tanglewood String Symposia of 1963 and 1964, has been published by the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer educational center for the advanced study of music. The 98-page document contains the complete text of the 1964 symposium and extracts from the session of 1963. Publication was made possible through the assistance of the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, Inc.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony and director of the Music Center, invited leading string players and teachers to Tanglewood in the summers of 1963 and 1964 to discuss the pressing problems caused by the shortage of string players. In addition to the transcripts of the symposia, the publication contains "Recommendations and Outlook," "Notes on the Participants and Observers," a "Foreword" by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and an "Introduction" by Louis Krasner, chairman of the two symposia and editor of "String Problems: Players and Paucity."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
APR 7 1965

String Players Paucity Discussed in Booklet

"String Problems: Players and Paucity," a transcript of the Tanglewood string symposia of 1963 and 1964, has been published by the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer educational center for the advanced study of music in Lenox. The 98-page document contains the complete text of the 1964 symposium and extracts from the session of 1963.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony and director of the center, invited leading string players and teachers to Tanglewood in the summers of 1963 and 1964 to discuss the problems caused by the shortage of string players.

Copies of the publication may be obtained by sending a check or money order for $1 to Syracuse University Press, Box 87, University Station, Syracuse, N. Y., 13210.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 49,343
APR 13 1965

THE CHORALAIRES of the Scotia-Glenville high school still need $6,600 for that proposed trip to Venezuela Aug. 13. Money must be raised by June 1 for the Operation Amigos concert tour. Contributions may be mailed to Operacion Amigos at 704 Riverside avenue, Scotia.

* * *

THE FINAL Metropolitan Opera broadcast of the season will feature Puccini's dramatic three-act opera "Tosca" this Saturday at 2 p.m. on WGY and WGFM. The opera will be the 503rd opera performance to be broadcast since Texaco began its sponsorship in December, 1940. French soprano Regine Crespin will be heard in the title role with Sandor Konya, tenor, as Mario Cavaradossi; and Robert Merrill, baritone, as the Baron Scarpia. Fauso Cleva will conduct.

* * *

THOMAS A. BROWN of 10 St. Stephen's Lane, Glenville, served as guest artist and percussion clinician at the mideast national music conference at Duquesne University. High school band director at Burnt Hills-Ballston Lake, he addressed the general assembly on "Percussion" during the three-day conference which ends today.

He also presented "Malletude," an original composition for vibraharp and marimba with concert band, playing with the Dykes high school band of Atlanta, Ga. He is associate director and mallet percussion specialist for the national stage band camp and serves on the board of directors of the Percussive Arts Society.

* * *

MRS. PHILIP BENNER of Randolph road attended the biennial convention of the Music Teachers National Association held recently at Dallas, Texas, where she attended piano programs, panel discussions, lectures, workshops in voice, opera and violin were included. She also attended a performance by the Dallas Symphony Orchestra and an evening of opera by the Opera Guild of the University of Southwestern Louisiana. Mrs. Benner has authored an article on "Successful Private Teaching" which appears in the current issue of the American Music Teacher magazine, the journal of the MTNA.

* * *

"STRING PROBLEMS: Players and Paucity," a transcript of the Tanglewood String Symposia of 1963 and 1964, has recently been published by the Berkshire Music Center. The 98-page document was published through the assistance of the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music Inc. and may be obtained by sending a check or money order for $1, to Syracuse University Press, Box 87, University Station, Syracuse, NY 13210.

* * *

THE COMPLETE programs of the 24 concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its eight-week season at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., have been announced by Erich Leinsdorf, music director. Guest conductors during the coming season include Eleazar de Carvalho, Jean Martinon, Charles Munch, Seiji Ozawa and Leopold Stokowski. A detailed brochure with program and ticket information may be obtained by writing the Berkshire Festival ticket office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 15 1964

Wanted: string players

By Myrian Baker
Washington Bureau of The Christian Science Monitor

There is a dearth of good string players, most music educators say, at least in the professional field of music. Some conductors and performers have been vociferous on this point, too, among them Eric Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He felt strongly enough about it to have the Boston Symphony sponsor a string symposium which was held at Tanglewood last August. Since workshops and symposiums have been good clearinghouses for airing the experts opinions and bringing the views of private and public school teachers to the attention of the experts, Mr. Leinsdorf invited 14 professional teachers and performers to act as panelists.

Eric Leinsdorf

Tanglewood students and string teachers around New England congregated in large flocks at the chamber music hall to hear the judgments of nationally attuned and recognized authorities. Mr. Leinsdorf delivered a prelude to the first of three meetings with some vivid phrases. "Something radical and energetic has to be done. Let us focus on awakening the indifference of young people." He discounted the economic status of musicians as relevant to the problem, and contemplated the impact of advertising techniques on an impressionable public.

The methods of piano advertisers were noted. He let it be known he did not have the answers, but he asked the panelists to go to work and unearth some leads that would at least touch the core of the string dearth. There would be another symposium next summer, and perhaps the next and next—until results came into view.

Richard Burgin head of Tanglewood's instrumental music department and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, moderated. The opening meeting consisted of each panelist coming to the fore and stating his opinions for the dearth, and in some instances, his own solutions. But the approach to this first symposium didn't really settle down until the second meeting as audience and panel alike began to feel a togetherness, a unifying path down which all participants might walk and talk in the context of the problem as Mr. Leinsdorf envisions it.

The final meeting came off as a question and answer affair. Mr. Burgin projected questions, and answers were juggled back and forth between panelists.

Max Oronoff

The panelists included Max Aronoff, Director of the New School of Music and violist of the Curtis String Quartet; Anshel Brusilow, concertmaster of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Stuart Canin, violin teacher, Oberlin Conservatory; Rafael Druian, concertmaster of the Cleveland Symphony; Broadus Earle, Yale University violin professor; Sydney Harth, department of music, Carnegie Institute of Technology; Louis Krasner, dept. of music at the University of Syracuse; Theo Salzman, principal cellist, Pittsburgh Symphony; Henry Siegl, concertmaster of the Seattle Symphony; Samuel Gardner, private teacher in New York City; Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; William Kroll of the Kroll Quartet, and Sheppard Lehnhoff of the Chicago Symphony.

Here are some reasons given for the string famine:

- Poor teachers at the elementary school level,
- Fallacious method books for beginners,
- Class string teaching,
- Lack of family cultural background,
- Low economic status of musicians (essentially in symphony orchestras),
- Wrong values taught (music is a language, not a skill).

Panaceas

Two lines of thought seemed to prevail—one, that the problem is economic, contrary to Mr. Leinsdorf's opinion, the other, that if the cultural climate and teaching methods were improved, the problem would be eased.

Some panaceas were offered. Having the parents attend the pupil's lesson was one. Others were improving the image of the musician by public relations procedures, sponsoring junior symphonies and showing interest (by the symphony orchestra) in their cities' music problems, string congresses where 100 young musicians gather annually to perform, and videotaping lessons given by the finest teachers for closed circuit viewing by string teachers.

One young Tanglewood student evidently destined for an orchestral career challenged the concertmasters, "How do you expect us to aspire to symphony jobs when we see orchestra violinists bored with making music? After they sit in a string section for 20 years, no player wants to teach music, let alone play it."

The motive must be right, Mr. Druian said in essence. If a musician treasures great music, no matter what his role or in what orchestra he plays, he won't be bored.

Mr. Leinsdorf ended the conclave by announcing another symposium to be held next summer. Several panelists received projects to research during the year.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 132,557
MAR 25 1965

Krasner Edits Book

Louis Krasner, noted violinist and member of the faculty of Syracuse University's School of Music, has edited a new book called "String Problems, Players and Paucity."

Krasner, who is also concertmaster of Syracuse Symphony, has included papers, panel discussions and recommendations from the Tanglewood String Symposia of 1963 and 1964, in which he participated, in the 98-page booklet.

Published by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the booklet focuses on social reasons for the shortage of players, improvements of economic standards, early and advanced training and way to encourage talented youngsters to consider string instrument playing as a career.

The School of Music Dean Howard Boatwright also participated in the symposia.

THE POST-STANDARD
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
D. 100,052 SUN. 193,341
MAR 25 1965

SU Prof Edits Music Booklet

Louis Krasner, professor of violin at Syracuse University, is editor of a new booklet, "String Problems, Players and Paucity."

Published by the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., in cooperation with Syracuse University's School of Music, it includes papers, panel discussions and recommendations from the Tanglewood String Symposia of 1963 and 1964.

CORTLAND, N. Y.
STANDARD
D. 10,000
APR 7 1965

KRASNER HAS PART IN TANGLEWOOD TEXT

String Problems: Players and Faculty, a transcript of the Tanglewood String Symposia of 1963 and 1964, has recently been published by the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer educational center for the advanced study of music. The 98-page document contains the complete text of the 1964 symposium and extracts from the session of 1963. Publication was made possible through the assistance of the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, Inc.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony and director of the Music Center, invited leading string players and teachers to Tanglewood in the summers of 1963 and 1964 to discuss the pressing problems caused by the shortage of string players. In addition to the transcripts of the symposia, the publication contains "Recommendations and Outlook," "Notes on the Participants and Observers," a "Foreword" by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and an "Introduction" by Louis Krasner, concertmaster of the Syracuse Symphony, who served as chairman of the two Symposia and editor of String Problems, Players and Faculty.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 28,717
APR 17 1965

String Symposia Published

"String Problems: Players and Paucity," a transcript of the Tanglewood String Symposia of 1963 and 1964, has recently been published by the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer educational center for the advanced study of music. The 98-page document contains the complete text of the 1964 symposium and extracts from the session of 1963. Publication was made possible through the assistance of the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, Inc.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony and director of the music center, invited leading string players and teachers to Tanglewood in the summers of 1963 and 1964 to discuss the pressing problems caused by the shortage of string players.

In addition to the transcripts of the symposia, the publication contains "Recommendations and Outlook," "Notes on the Participants and Observers," a foreword by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and an introduction by Louis Krasner, chairman of the two symposia and editor of "String Problems."

Copies of the publication may be obtained by sending a check or money order for $1 to the Syracuse University Press, Box 87, University Station, Syracuse, N.Y. 13210.

NewEngl
Box 2078. B
Tr
NORTH Ci
APR 6 1965

Tanglewood String Problems Published

"String Problems: Players and Paucity," a transcript of the Tanglewood String Symposia of 1963 and 1964, has been published by the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer educational center for the advanced study of music. The 98-page document contains the complete text of the 1964 symposium and extracts from the session of 1963. Publication was made possible through the assistance of the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, Inc.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony and director of the Music Center, invited leading string players and teachers to Tanglewood in the summers of 1963 and 1964 to discuss the pressing problems caused by the shortage of string players. In addition to the transcripts of the symposia, the publication contains "Recommendations and Outlook," "Notes on the Participants and Observers," a "Foreword" by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and an "Introduction" by Louis Krasner, chairman of the two symposia and editor of "String Problems: Players and Paucity."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
APR 7 1965

String Players Paucity Discussed in Booklet

"String Problems: Players and Paucity," a transcript of the Tanglewood string symposia of 1963 and 1964, has been published by the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer educational center for the advanced study of music in Lenox. The 98-page document contains the complete text of the 1964 symposium and extracts from the session of 1963.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony and director of the center, invited leading string players and teachers to Tanglewood in the summers of 1963 and 1964 to discuss the problems caused by the shortage of string players.

Copies of the publication may be obtained by sending a check or money order for $1 to Syracuse University Press, Box 87, University Station, Syracuse, N. Y. 13210.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 49,343
APR 13 1965

THE CHORALAIRES of the Scotia-Glenville high school still need $6,600 for that proposed trip to Venezuela Aug. 13. Money must be raised by June 1 for the Operation Amigos concert tour. Contributions may be mailed to Operacion Amigos at 704 Riverside avenue, Scotia.

* * *

THE FINAL Metropolitan Opera broadcast of the season will feature Puccini's dramatic three-act opera "Tosca" this Saturday at 2 p.m. on WGY and WGFM. The opera will be the 503rd opera performance to be broadcast since Texaco began its sponsorship in December, 1940. French soprano Regine Crespin will be heard in the title role with Sandor Konya, tenor, as Mario Cavaradossi; and Robert Merrill, baritone, as the Baron Scarpia. Fauso Cleva will conduct.

* * *

THOMAS A. BROWN of 10 St. Stephen's Lane, Glenville, served as guest artist and percussion clinician at the mideast national music conference at Duquesne University. High school band director at Burnt Hills-Ballston Lake, he addressed the general assembly on "Percussion" during the three-day conference which ends today.

He also presented "Malletude," an original composition for vibraharp and marimba with concert band, playing with the Dykes high school band of Atlanta, Ga. He is associate director and mallet percussion specialist for the national music band camp and serves on the board of directors of the Percussive Arts Society.

* * *

MRS. PHILIP BENNER of Randolph road attended the biennial convention of the Music Teachers National Association held recently at Dallas, Texas, where she attended piano programs, panel discussions, lectures, workshops in voice, opera and violin were included. She also attended a performance by the Dallas Symphony Orchestra and an evening of opera by the Opera Guild of the University of Southwestern Louisiana. Mrs. Benner has authored an article on "Successful Private Teaching" which appears in the current issue of the American Music Teacher magazine, the journal of the MTNA.

* * *

"STRING PROBLEMS: Players and Paucity," a transcript of the Tanglewood String Symposia of 1963 and 1964, has recently been published by the Berkshire Music Center. The 98-page document was published through the assistance of the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music Inc. and may be obtained by sending a check or money order for $1 to Syracuse University Press, Box 87, University Station, Syracuse, NY 13210.

* * *

THE COMPLETE programs of the 24 concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its eight-week season at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., have been announced by Erich Leinsdorf, music director. Guest conductors during the coming season include Eleazar de Carvalho, Jean Martinon, Charles Munch, Seiji Ozawa and Leopold Stokowski. A detailed brochure with program and ticket information may be obtained by writing the Berkshire Festival ticket office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115.

14 CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN MUSIC FESTIVAL AUG 9-13

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
BAY NEWS
W. 12,125

OCT 12 1963

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,422

AUG 8 1964

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 772,439 S. 1,120,153

DEC 22 1963

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

NOV 1963

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
KINGS COURIER
W: 15,201

OCT 12 1963

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 46,382

OCT 22 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209

OCT 7 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,084

OCT 8 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,730

OCT 17 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

OCT 20 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302

OCT 6 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302

OCT 20 1963

10 COMMISSIONS ARE ANNOUNCED AT TANGLEWOOD

Leinsdorf to Present Compositions During 1964 Festival

BOSTON—Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center, has announced that 10 composers have been awarded commissions by the Berkshire Music Center, and that the resulting works will be given their premiere performances at a Festival of Contemporary American Music to be held at Tanglewood Aug. 9-13, 1964. The Contemporary American Music Festival will be presented by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which made nine of the 10 commissions available.

Chamber Music

The commissions given by the Fromm Foundation will be for chamber music compositions. Three of these will be published by the Associated Music Publishers and will also be performed at a special Tanglewood concert in New York during the season of 1964-65. This concert will be presented under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

The nine recipients of commission for chamber music works were selected from 54 composers whose works were considered by the reading committee. Some of the composers who were not chosen at this time will be invited to accept commissions from the Fromm Music Foundation at a later date.

Those receiving commissions for chamber music compositions from the Berkshire Music Center as follows: Randolph Coleman, Evanston, Ill.; Mario Davidovsky, New York, N. Y.; Donald Martino, New Haven, Conn.; Robert Newell, Urbana, Ill.; John MacIvor Perkins, Chicago, Ill.; Loren Rush, Point Richmond, Cal.; Harvey Sollberger, David del Tredici, Charles Wuorinen, all of New York, N. Y. Davidovsky, Newell and del Tredici have attended past sessions of the Music Center.

The 10th commission announced by Mr. Leinsdorf was the Samuel Wechsler Commission, made available by Samuel Wechsler of New York City. This was awarded to William Sydeman, also of New York City, for a choral work which will be performed by the Tanglewood Choir at the Berkshire Music Center's Festival of Contemporary American Music next summer. Mr. Sydeman, who was chosen for the Wechsler Commission by the Berkshire Music Center faculty, attended the Music Center in 1955 and 1956.

The 22d session of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music, will open on June 28, and continue for eight weeks.

CAPITAL
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YOR STATE SERVICE

CAIRO HERALD
Thursday, August 6, 1964

CAPITAL
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YOR STATE SERVICE

ATHENS HERALD
Thursday, August 6, 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,427

AUG

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,499

JUL 30 1964

CAPITAL
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YOR STATE SERVICE

TROY TIMES RECORD
Saturday, August 8, 1964

GREENVILLE, N. Y.
LOCAL
W: 500

AUG 5 1964

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

JUL 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,240

JUL 31 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Time (e)
GREENWICH, Conn.
Circ. 10,854

JUL 31 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193

JUL 31 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,439

AUG 4 1964

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 831,904 SUN. 1,138,268

AUG 9 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 47,164

JUL 31 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304

JUL 31 1964

Schedule of Concerts, Panels, Rehearsals Listed for Contemporary Music Festival

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center, has announced the full schedule of concerts, open rehearsals and panel discussions which will take place at the five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music at Tanglewood, August 9-13.

This festival within a festival will be presented by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which has gained an international reputation for its encouragement of contemporary composition and performance and has actively supported the Music Center's contemporary music program since 1956.

10 Composers

The five-day festival will serve primarily to focus attention on 10 selected young American composers, each of whom has achieved recognition in certain areas of the country but none of whom has yet received a nationwide reputation. The Berkshire Music Center has commissioned each of the 10 composers to write a work for the festival, in cooperation with the Fromm Foundation for nine of the works, the 10th being the recipient of the Samuel Wechsler Commission of New York City. In addition to the 10 commissioned works, all of which will have their world premieres during the festival, each composer will be represented by one other work.

All the works will be heard in a series of four evening concerts in the Theatre at Tanglewood, Sunday, Aug. 9; Monday, Aug. 10; Wednesday, Aug. 12; and Thursday, Aug. 13. Each concert will have an open dress rehearsal several hours earlier. The performers for the various events will consist primarily of the Fromm Fellows, the 13 young instrumentalists who are playing contemporary music exclusively this summer under fellowships from the Fromm Foundation. They will be joined in one program by the Tanglewood Choir and soloists from the Vocal Department. The above-mentioned rehearsals and concerts will be open only to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, those who make a voluntary contribution to the support of the Center.

In Residence

The 10 composers whose works will be featured are now in residence at Tanglewood and assisting in the preparation of their works. They are: Randolph Coleman, Evanston, Ill.; Donald Martino New Haven, Conn.; Robert Newell, Urbana, Ill.; John MacIvor Perkins, Chicago, Ill.; Loren Rush, Point Richmond, Calif.; Mario Davidovsky, Harvey Sollberger, David del Tredici, and Charles Wuorinen, all of New York City; and William Sydeman, New York City, recipient of the Samuel Wechsler Commission. The public will have an opportunity to learn something of their personal approaches to composition through a series of three panel discussions which will take place Monday (Aug. 10), Wednesday (Aug. 12) and Thursday (Aug. 13) at 2 p.m. in the Theatre at Tanglewood. Aaron Copland, head of the Music Center's Composition Department, will be moderator at all three panels.

On Monday, Lukas Foss, Leon Kirchner and five of the commissioned composers will discuss "Problems of Materials." Wednesday afternoon Gunther Schuller, Arthur Berger and five of the commissioned composers will discuss "Problems of Aesthetics." Messrs. Schuller, Foss and Berger are currently on the faculty of the Composition Department and Mr. Kirchner has previously been a composer in residence at the Music Center. The panel discussion of Thursday afternoon has been designated simply as a "General Roundup" and will be arranged by Mr. Copland to meet the needs suggested by the events of the previous four days. The three panel discussions will also be open only to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Chamber Concert

The Berkshire Festival's Tuesday Evening Chamber Music Concert of August 11 will follow the spirit of the Festival of Contemporary American Music by presenting the Lenox Quartet in a program of works by four eminent American composers. The quartet, which formed while in residence at Tanglewood in 1958 and took its name from the town of Lenox, will perform Elliott Carter's String Quartet No. 2; Arthur Berger's String Quartet; Gunther Schuller's String Quartet No. 1; and Leon Kirchner's String Quartet No. 2. It is expected that all the composers will be present for the concert. The regular admission prices of the Tuesday Chamber Music Concerts will apply at this program.

The complete schedule of the Festival of Contemporary American Music at Tanglewood is as follows:

Sunday, August 9:

4:30 p.m.—
Dress rehearsal (open) — Theater
8:00 p.m.—
Concert by the Fromm Fellows — Theater
Quartet for Flute, Violin, Clarinet and Piano — Sydeman
Nexus 16 (Fromm Commission—First Performance — Rush
Caprice (1963) — Perkins
Grand Quartet for Flutes — Sollberger
Synchronisms No. 2, for Flute, Clarinet, Violin, Viola and tape recorder (Fromm Commission—First Performance) — Davidovsky
Chamber Concerto for Flute and Ten Players (Fromm Commission—First Performance) — Wuorinen

Monday, August 10

10:00 a.m.:
Dress rehearsal (open) — Theater
2:00 p.m.:
Panel Discussion — Theater
"Problems of Materials"—Lukas Foss, Leon Kirchner, and 5 of the 10 commissioned composers; Aaron Copland, moderator
8:00 p.m.:
Concert—Tanglewood Choir, Fromm Fellows — Theater
Stabat Mater for Soprano Solo and Chorus (First Perf.) — Pinkham
"The Trojan Women," for Soprano and Alto soloists and seven instruments (1962 Wechsler Commission) — Newell
Canso I—Canso II (First Performance) — Silverman
"The Lament of Elektra," for Alto solo and Chorus (1963 Wechsler Commission—First Performance) — Sydeman

Tuesday, Aug 11:

10:00 a.m.:
Dress Rehearsal (Open) — Theater
3:30 p.m.:
Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music Concert — Chamber Music Hall
Woodwind Quartet in C Major (1941) — Berger
String Quartet (1953) — Fine
Quintet (1948) — Carter
Piano Quartet (1964) — Piston
8:00 p.m.:
Berkshire Festival Chamber Music Concert by the Lenox Quartet
String Quartet No. 2 — Carter
String Quartet — Berger
String Quartet No. 1 — Schuller
String Quartet No. 2 — Kirchner

Wednesday, August 12:

10:00 a.m.:
Dress Rehearsal (Open) — Theater
2:00 p.m.:
Panel Discussion — Theater
"Problems of Aesthetics"—Gunther Schuller, Arthur Berger, and 5 of the 10 commissioned composers; Aaron Copland, Moderator
8:00 p.m.:
Concert by the Fromm Fellows — Theater
Synchronisms No. 1, for Flute and tape recorder — Davidovsky
Trio for Violin, Clarinet and Piano — Martino
Concerto for Piano and Chamber Orchestra (Fromm Commission —First Performance) — Coleman
Mandala Music — Rush
"I Hear an Army" for Soprano and String Quartet (Fromm Commission—First Performance) — Del Tredici
Chamber Variations for Twelve Players and Conductor (1964) — (Fromm Commission—First Performance) — Sollberger

Thursday, August 13:

10:00 a.m.:
Dress Rehearsal (Open) — Theater
2:00 p.m.:
Panel Discussion (General Roundup) — Theater
Aaron Copland, Moderator
8:00 p.m.:
Concert by the Fromm Fellows — Theater
Projection No. 3, for Flute, Oboe, Clarinet — Coleman
Concerto for Piano and Chamber Orchestra in 2 movements (Fromm Commission — First Performance) — Newell
Piano Variations — Wuorinen
Fantasy Pieces for Piano — Del Tredici
Concerto for Wind Quintet (Fromm Commission—First Performance) — Martino Music for Thirteen Players (Fromm Commission—First Performance) — Perkins

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1964

◆ HARVEY SOLLBERGER'S Chamber Variations for 12 players and conductor, a Berkshire Festival commission, was given its world premiere performance during the Fromm Fellows concert on August 12, one of the programs of the Festival of Contemporary Music at the Berkshire Music Center, Lenox, Mass.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1964

◆ Synchronisms No. 2 by MARIO DAVIDOVSKY, a Berkshire Festival commission, was premiered during the Fromm Fellows concert, the opening program of the Festival of Contemporary American Music at the Berkshire Music Festival, August 9.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1964

◆ CHARLES WUORINEN'S Chamber Concerto, commissioned by the Berkshire Festival, had its premiere performance during the Fromm Fellows concert which opened the Festival of Contemporary American Music at the Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass., August 9.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1964

◆ ARVED KURTZ'S cantata "Window to the World," with words by Suzanne Kurtz, was given its world premiere performance by the New York College of Music Chorus under John L. Motley during the 86th anniversary concert and commencement exercises of the New York College of Music.

◆ DONALD MARTINO'S Concerto for wind quintet, a Berkshire Festival commission, had its first performance during the August 13 Fromm Fellows concert, a program of the Festival of Contemporary American Music at the Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Standard-Times
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 66,819

AUG 9 1964

5-Day Festival Of Music Is Slated

LENOX, Aug. 8 (UPI) — The Berkshire Music Center will present a five-day festival of American contemporary music starting Sunday evening.

The festival will be given in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago and will feature 10 commissioned works, all receiving world premieres.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

AUG 2 1964

BERKSHIRE TO HONOR 10 YOUNG COMPOSERS

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 1—Ten young composers will be honored at a Festival of Contemporary American Music to be held at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Aug. 9 through 13.

Each of the 10 was selected, because in the opinion of officials at the Center, he "has achieved recognition in certain areas of the country but has not yet achieved a nationwide reputation."

The 10 are Randolph Coleman, Evanston, Ill.; Donald Martino, New Haven; Robert Newell, Urbana, Ill.; John McIvor Perkins, Chicago.; Loren Rush, Point Richmond, Calif.

And from New York, Mario Davidovsky, Harvey Sollberger, William Sydeman, David del Tredici and Charles Wuorinen.

The Berkshire center has commissioned each of the 10 to write a work for the festival, nine in cooperation with the Fromm Foundation and the 10th (Mr. Sydeman) with the help of the Samuel Wechsler Commission of New York.

All of the works, and one more from each of the composers, will be played during the festival in evening concerts in the Tanglewood Theater on Aug. 9, 10, 12 and 13. There will be an open dress rehearsal several hours before each concert.

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 496,980 S. 492,211

AUG 5 1964

Interested listener at a Tanglewood rehearsal of his Concerto for Woodwind Quintet is Donald Martino (standing at center). Fellow composer Gunther Schuller conducts the group at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., where a five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music begins next week. Nine compositions commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago will have their world premieres during the festival, Aug. 9-13. A 10th work, winner of the Samuel Wechsler Commission, also will be presented. The 10 composers whose works will be featured are at Tanglewood helping to prepare the performances. They are Randolph Coleman of Evanston, Ill.; John MacIvor Perkins of the University of Chicago music faculty; Donald Martino of New Haven, Conn.; Robert Newell of Urbana, Ill.; Loren Rush of Point Richmond, Calif.; Mario Davidovsky, Harvey Sollberger, David del Tredici and Charles Wuorinen, all of New York City. Taking part in panel discussions along with the young composers will be Aaron Copland, Lukas Foss, Gunther Schuller, Arthur Berger and Leon Kirchner.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 3,304

AUG 6 1964

Tanglewood to Feature Five Days Of Contemporary American Music

On this Sunday, Aug. 9, the first concert of the five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music will take place at 8 p.m. in the Tanglewood Theatre at Lenox. This "Festival Within a Festival" is sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bershire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

In addition to five evenings, Aug. 9 through Aug. 13, of performances of new American music, including twelve world premieres, the Festival will include three panel discussions moderated by Aaron Copland, head of the Music Center's Composition Department. Panelists will include Arthur Berger, Lukas Foss, Leon Kirchner, Gunther Schuller and several of the composers whose works will be premiered.

Two conductorial colleagues of Music Director Erich Leinsdorf will make their first Berkshire Festival appearances next weekend at Tanglewood in Lenox. Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra, and Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Ravinia Festival, to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston on Friday, Aug. 14, at 8 p.m., and Sunday, Aug. 16, 2:30 p.m., respectively. For his concert on Saturday, Aug. 15, at 8 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf will have Lorin Hollander as his guest for a performance of Richard Strauss' "Burleske."

The Aug. 14 concert, conducted by Mr. Rudolf, will include Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," the Symphony No. 2 by Beethoven, Richard Strauss' "Macbeth" and the "Firebird Suite" from the ballet by Stravinsky.

Mr. Leinsdorf's program on Aug. 15 will begin with Wagner's Prelude to Act I of "Tristan and Isolde." This will be followed by William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2 which received its world preiere by Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston on November 22, 1963. Lorin Hollander will then join the Orchestra for the performance of Strauss' "Burleske." Saturday's concert will close with Mendelssohn's Overture and Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Patricia Peardon will appear as Narrator for selections from Shakespeare's play which were chosen by Mr. Leinsdorf. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and June Genovese, mezzo-soprano. An open rehearsal for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund will be held at 10 a.m. Saturday.

Since his summer as a member of the Berkshire Music Center's Conducting Department in 1960 when he won the Serge Koussevitsky Memorial Conducting Prize, for a conductor of great merit, Seiji Ozawa has won wide acclaim in this country and abroad for his musical interpretations. When the late Pierre Monteux became ill and was forced to cancel his summer appearances, Mr. Leinsdorf invited Ozawa to conduct the Aug. 16 program. This concert will begin with Bizet's Symphony in C major and include the Symphony, "Mathis den Maler," ("Matthias the Painter") by Hindemith and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" arranged for orchestra by Ravel.

BETHLEHEM, PA.
GLOBE-TIMES
D. 28,800

JUL 31 1964

Tanglewood

The Festival of Contemporary American Music to be held at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., Aug. 9 to 13, will include six concerts and open rehearsals and three panel discussions. There will be 12 first performances.

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center, has announced that the five-day festival will focus attention on 10 selected young American composers, each of whom has received recognition in certain parts of the country but none of whom has yet won nationwide attention. Each of these has been commissioned to write a work for the festival and these will have their world premieres during a series of four evening concerts in the Tanglewood Theatre.

The performers will be 13 young instrumentalists, primarily fellows of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. In one program they will be joined by the Tanglewood Choir and soloists from the vocal department.

The 10 composers are, Randolph Coleman of Evanston, Ill.; Donald Martino, New Haven, Conn.; Robert Newell, Urbana, Ill.; John MacIvor Perkins, Chicago; Loren Rush, Point Richmond, Cal.; Mario Davidovsky, Harvey Sollberger, David del Tredici, Charles Wuorinen, and William Sydeman, all of New York City.

Aaron Copland, head of the music center's composition department, will be moderator for all of the panels.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 283,236 SUN. 296,860

AUG 5 1964

Foss Will Take A Leading Role in Berkshire Festival

Philharmonic conductor Lukas Foss will take a leading role next week in a precedent-making Festival of Contemporary American Music, a feature of the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood, Mass.

Mr. Foss, a faculty member of the sponsoring Berkshire Music Center, will be a principal speaker in panel sessions, along with nationally-known composers Gunther Schuller, Arthur Berger and Leon Kirchner, former Slee professor of the State University of Buffalo.

The panels will be headed by composer Aaron Copland, also a former Slee Professor in Buffalo, and the sessions will be attended by Allen D. Sapp, Chairman of the UB Music Department. Performances will be given Aug. 9-13.

A striking innovation of the festival is the commissioning and performance of works by ten young American composers, nine of them sponsored by the Fromm Foundation of Chicago and the tenth the winner of the Samuel Wechsler Commission, a New York City award.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1964

◆ HARVEY SOLLBERGER's Chamber Variations for 12 players and conductor, a Berkshire Festival commission, was given its world premiere performance during the Fromm Fellows concert on August 12, one of the programs of the Festival of Contemporary Music at the Berkshire Music Festival, Lenox, Mass.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1964

◆ Synchronisms No. 2 by MARIO DAVIDOVSKY, a Berkshire Festival commission, was premiered during the Fromm Fellows concert, the opening program of the Festival of Contemporary American Music at the Berkshire Music Festival, August 9.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1964

◆ CHARLES WUORINEN's Chamber Concerto, commissioned by the Berkshire Festival, had its premiere performance during the Fromm Fellows concert which opened the Festival of Contemporary American Music at the Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass., August 9.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1964

◆ ARVED KURTZ's cantata "Window to the World," with words by Suzanne Kurtz, was given its world premiere performance by the New York College of Music Chorus under John L. Motley during the 86th anniversary concert and commencement exercises of the New York College of Music.

◆ DONALD MARTINO's Concerto for wind quintet, a Berkshire Festival commission, had its first performance during the August 13 Fromm Fellows concert, a program of the Festival of Contemporary American Music at the Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Standard-Times
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 66,819

AUG 9 1964

5-Day Festival Of Music Is Slated

LENOX, Aug. 8 (UPI) — The Berkshire Music Center will present a five-day festival of American contemporary music starting Sunday evening.

The festival will be given in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago and will feature 10 commissioned works, all receiving world premieres. 947

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

AUG 2 1964

BERKSHIRE TO HONOR 10 YOUNG COMPOSERS

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 1—Ten young composers will be honored at a Festival of Contemporary American Music to be held at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Aug. 9 through 13.

Each of the 10 was selected, because in the opinion of officials at the Center, he "has achieved recognition in certain areas of the country but has not yet achieved a nationwide reputation."

The 10 are Randolph Coleman, Evanston, Ill.; Donald Martino, New Haven; Robert Newell, Urbana, Ill.; John MacIvor Perkins, Chicago.; Loren Rush, Point Richmond, Calif.

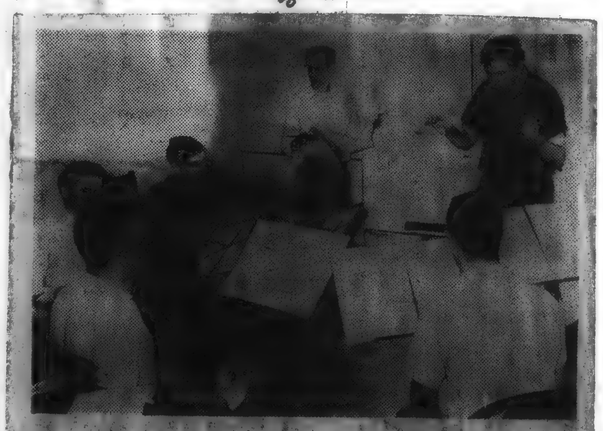
And from New York, Mario Davidovsky, Harvey Sollberger, William Sydeman, David del Tredici and Charles Wuorinen.

The Berkshire center has commissioned each of the 10 to write a work for the festival, nine in cooperation with the Fromm Foundation and the 10th (Mr. Sydeman) with the help of the Samuel Wechsler Commission of New York.

All of the works, and one more from each of the composers, will be played during the festival in evening concerts in the Tanglewood Theater on Aug. 9, 10, 12 and 13. There will be an open dress rehearsal several hours before each concert.

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 496,980 S. 492,211

AUG 5 1964



Interested listener at a Tanglewood rehearsal of his Concerto for Woodwind Quintet is Donald Martino (standing at center). Fellow composer Gunther Schuller conducts the group at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., where a five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music begins next week. Nine compositions commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago will have their world premieres during the festival, Aug. 9-13. A 10th work, winner of the Samuel Wechsler Commission, also will be presented. The 10 composers whose works will be featured are at Tanglewood helping to prepare the performances. They are Randolph Coleman of Evanston, Ill.; John MacIver Perkins of the University of Chicago music faculty; Donald Martino of New Haven, Conn.; Robert Newell of Urbana, Ill.; Loren Rush of Point Richmond, Calif.; Mario Davidovsky, Harvey Sollberger, David del Tredici and Charles Wuorinen, all of New York City. Taking part in panel discussions along with the young composers will be Aaron Copland, Lukas Foss, Gunther Schuller, Arthur Berger and Leon Kirchner.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 3,304

AUG 6 1964

Tanglewood to Feature Five Days Of Contemporary American Music

On this Sunday, Aug. 9, the first concert of the five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music will take place at 8 p.m. in the Tanglewood Theatre at Lenox. This "Festival Within a Festival" is being offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bershire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

In addition to five evenings, Aug. 9 through Aug. 13, of performances of new American music, including twelve world premieres, the Festival will include three panel discussions moderated by Aaron Copland, head of the Music Center's Composition Department. Panelists will include Arthur Berger, Lukas Foss, Leon Kirchner, Gunther Schuller and several of the composers whose works will be premiered.

Two conductorial colleagues of Music Director Erich Leinsdorf will make their first Berkshire Festival appearances next weekend at Tanglewood in Lenox. Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra, and Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Ravinia Festival, to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston on Friday, Aug. 14, at 8 p.m. and Sunday, Aug. 16, 2:30 p.m., respectively. For his concert on Saturday, Aug. 15, at 8 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf will have Lorin Hollander as his guest for a performance of Richard Strauss' "Burleske."

The Aug. 14 concert, conducted by Mr. Rudolf, will include Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," the Symphony No. 2 by Beethoven, Richard Strauss' "Macbeth" and the "Firebird Suite" from the ballet by Stravinsky.

Mr. Leinsdorf's program on Aug. 15 will begin with Wagner's Prelude to Act 1 of "Tristan and Isolde." This will be followed by William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2 which received its world premiere by Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston on November 22, 1963. Lorin Hollander will then join the Orchestra for the performance of Strauss' "Burleske." Saturday's concert will close with Mendelssohn's Overture and Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Patricia Pearson will appear as Narrator for selections from Shakespeare's play which were chosen by Mr. Leinsdorf. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and June Genovese, mezzo-soprano. An open rehearsal for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund will be held at 10 a.m. Saturday.

Since his summer as a member of the Berkshire Music Center's Conducting Department in 1960 when he won the Serge Koussevitsky Memorial Conducting Prize, for a conductor of great merit, Seiji Ozawa has won wide acclaim in this country and abroad for his musical interpretations. When the late Pierre Monteux became ill and was forced to cancel his summer appearances, Mr. Leinsdorf invited Ozawa to conduct the Aug. 16 program. This concert will begin with Bizet's Symphony in C major and include the Symphony, "Mathis der Maler," ("Matthias the Painter") by Hindemith and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" arranged for orchestra by Ravel.

BETHLEHEM, PA.
GLOBE-TIMES
D. 28,800

JUL 31 1964

Tanglewood

The Festival of Contemporary American Music to be held at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., Aug. 9 to 13, will include six concerts and open rehearsals and three panel discussions. There will be 12 first performances.

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center, has announced that the five-day festival will focus attention on 10 selected young American composers, each of whom has received recognition in certain parts of the country but none of whom has yet won nationwide attention. Each of these has been commissioned to write a work for the festival and these will have their world premieres during a series of four evening concerts in the Tanglewood Theatre.

The performers will be 13 young instrumentalists, primarily fellows of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. In one program they will be joined by the Tanglewood Choir and soloists from the vocal department.

The 10 composers are, Randolph Coleman of Evanston, Ill.; Donald Martino, New Haven, Conn.; Robert Newell, Urbana, Ill.; John MacIvor Perkins, Chicago; Loren Rush, Point Richmond, Cal.; Mario Davidovsky, Harvey Solleberger, David del Tredici, Charles Wuorinen, and William Sydeman, all of New York City.

Aaron Copland, head of the music center's composition department, will be moderator for all of the panels.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 283,236 SUN. 296,860

AUG 5 1964

Foss Will Take A Leading Role in Berkshire Festival

Philharmonic conductor Lukas Foss will take a leading role next week in a precedent-making Festival of Contemporary American Music, a feature of the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood, Mass.

Mr. Foss, a faculty member of the sponsoring Berkshire Music Center, will be a principal speaker in panel sessions, along with nationally-known composers Gunther Schuller, Arthur Berger and Leon Kirchner, former Slee professor of the State University of Buffalo.

The panels will be headed by composer Aaron Copland, also a former Slee Professor in Buffalo, and the sessions will be attended by Allen D. Sapp, Chairman of the UB Music Department. Performances will be given Aug. 9-13.

A striking innovation of the festival is the commissioning and performance of works by ten young American composers, nine of them sponsored by the Fromm Foundation of Chicago and the tenth the winner of the Samuel Wechsler Commission, a New York City award.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193

AUG 5 1964

American Music Fete Rehearsals On at Tanglewood

Rehearsals are under way this week for the Festival of Contemporary American Music at Tanglewood, Lenox, Aug. 9-13, which will be presented by the Berkshire Music Center with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

The purpose of this festival within a festival — the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival — is to focus attention on the work of young American composers who have not yet reached nationwide recognition. The Music Center has commissioned a work from each of 10 young composers for this festival, nine in cooperation with the Fromm Foundation and the tenth being the recipient of the 1963 Samuel Wechsler Commission of New York City. The 10 works plus other representative works of each of the composers will be heard in a series of four evening concerts at Tanglewood Aug. 9, 10, 12 and 13. Each program will have an open dress rehearsal earlier in the day so that the public may have an opportunity to become more familiar with the works.

The young composers will also take part in three panel discussions which will be headed by Aaron Copland, chairman of the faculty of the Music Center, and will feature as key speakers the composers Lukas Foss, Gunther Schuller, Leon Kirchner and Arthur Berger.

The program of works by the 10 composers will be performed largely by the Fromm Fellows, the 13 young instrumentalists who are playing contemporary music exclusively this summer under fellowships from the Fromm Foundation. They will be joined in one program by the Tanglewood Choir.

Members of the Berkshire Music Center will be heard Aug. 11 in their own chamber music program of works by Fine, Carter, Berger, and Piston. The Berkshire Festival's regular Tuesday Evening chamber music concert of Aug. 11 will feature the Lenox Quartet in works by Carter, Berger, Schuller, and Kirchner. Messrs. Berger and Schuller are currently on the faculty of the Composition Department, and Messrs. Kirchner and Fine (died 1962) were formerly on the faculty.

The concerts, open rehearsals and panel discussions will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, those who make a voluntary contribution to the support of the Center. This may be done at the time of arrival for any specific event, and a membership card allows one to hear all Berkshire Music Center events for the remainder of the season.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
Transcript
Eve. Circ. 13,240

AUG 4 1964

TIMES-UNION 8/6/64

Four established American composers, seated at table meet with group of young composers at Tanglewood. They are working to prepare the Festival of Contemporary American Music to be held Aug. 9 to 13. Seated right to left are Composers Arthur Berger, Gunther Schuller, Aaron Copeland and Lukas Foss. Seated at left are Randolph Coleman and Harvey Sollberger. Standing from left are Loren Rush, David del Tredici, Mario Davidovsky, William Sydeman, Charles Wuorinen, John MacIvor Perkins and Donald Martino.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 176,483

AUG 7 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
Transcript
Eve. Circ. 13,240

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711

AUG 7 1964

Contemporary American Music at Tanglewood

LENOX—Five concerts devoted to contemporary American music will constitute a festival within the Berkshire Festival Aug. 9-13 at Tanglewood, Summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Performances nightly at 8 Sunday through Thursday will be by students of the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Fellows, instrumentalists supported at Tanglewood by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, a sponsor of the contemporary festival.

In addition to the concerts, there will be three panel discussions. Participants will include Aaron Copland, Lukas Foss, Gunther Schuller, Arthur Berger and many of the composers whose works will have first performances at the festival. Of the dozen new works, nine were commissioned by the Fromm Foundation and two by Samuel Wechsler.

Composers to be heard include Randolph Coleman, Donald Martino, Robert Newell, John McIvor Perkins, Loren Rush, Mario Davidovsky, Harvey Sollberger, David Del Tredici, Charles Wuorinen, William Sydeman and Daniel Pinkham.

The schedule is as follows:

Sunday at 8, Sydeman: Quartet for flute, violin, clarinet and piano; Rush: Nexus 16; Perkins: Caprice; Sollberger: Grand Quartet for Flutes; Davidovsky: Synchronisms No. 2 for flute, clarinet, violin, viola, tape recorder; Wuorinen: Camber Concerto for flute and ten players.

Monday at 2. Panel: "Problems of Materials," with Foss, Kirchner, and five composers; Copland, moderator. Evening at 8. Pinkham: Stabat Mater, for soprano and chorus; Newell: "The Trojan Women," for soprano, alto and seven instruments; Silverman: Canso I-Canso II; Sydeman: "The Lament of Elektra," for alto and chorus.

Tuesday at 3:30, Berger: Woodwind Quintet; Fine: String Quartet; Carter: Quintet; Piston: Piano Quartet. Evening at 8. Lenox String Quartet in Carter: Quartet No. 2; Berger: Quartet; Schuller: Quartet No. 1; Kirchner; Quartet No. 2.

Wednesday at 2 Panel: "Problems of Esthetics," with Schuller. Berger, and five composers; Copland, moderator. Evening at 8. Davidovsky: Synchronisms No. 1, for flute and tape recorder; Martino: Trio for clarinet, violin and piano; Coleman: Concerto for piano and chamber orchestra; Rush: Mandala Music; Del Tredici: "I Hear an Army," for soprano and string quartet; Sollberger: Chamber Variations for twelve players and conductor.

Thursday at 2. Panel: general roundup; Copland, moderator. Evening at 8. Coleman: Projection No. 3, for flute, oboe and clarinet; Newell: Concerto for Piano and Chamber Orchetra, in two movements; Wuorinen: Piano Variations; Del Tredici: Fantasy Pieces for Piano; Martino: Concerto for Wind Quintet; Perkins: Music for Thirteen Players.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105

AUG 9 1964

Contemporary Music At Berkshire Festival

LENOX—A festival within a festival, of contemporary American music, will begin today at the Berkshire Festival. Other concerts this week at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony, will include four programs by the orchestra and a concert by the Lenox Quartet.

The contemporary music festival, Sunday through Thursday evenings at 8, will have 12 world premieres. The event is sponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which commissioned nine of the works. Two were commissioned by Samuel Wechsler. In addition to these concerts, there will be three panel discussions by composers teaching at or visiting the Berkshire Music Center.

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Friday, August 7, 1964

Tanglewood to Present Works of 10 Americans

A five-day festival of contemporary music, featuring four evening concerts, will begin Sunday at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

* * *

THE FESTIVAL will be devoted to the works of 10 young American composers, each of whom has achieved recognition in certain areas of the country but none of whom has yet received a nationwide reputation.

Each of the composers has been commissioned to write a work for the festival. In addition, each composer will be represented by one other work.

All the works will be heard in a series of four concerts in the theater at Tanglewood at 8 p.m. on Aug. 9, 10, 12 and 13. Each concert will have an open dress rehearsal several hours earlier.

* * *

THE COMPOSERS are Randolph Coleman, Evanston, Ill.; Donald Martino, New Haven, Conn.; Robert Newell, Urbana, Ill.; John MacIvor Perkins, Chicago, Ill.; Loren Rush, Point Richmond, Calif.; Mario Davidovsky, David del Tredici and Charles Wuorinen, all of New York city.

In addition to the concerts, the festival will include panel discussions on Aug. 10, 12 and 13 in the theater. Aaron Copeland, head of the Berkshire music center's composition department, will be moderator for the panels, which will also include the composers and faculty members.

* * *

THE FESTIVAL is sponsored by the music center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which has supported the center's contemporary music programs since 1956. Performers in the concerts will be mainly Fromm Fellows, 13 young instrumentalists who are playing contemporary music exclusively this summer under fellowships from the Fromm Foundation.

The chamber music concert Aug. 11 at 8 p.m. will follow the spirit of the festival by presenting the Lenox Quartet in a program of works by four American composers. The works are Elliott Carter's "String Quartet No. 2," Arthur Berger's "String Quartet," Gunther Schuller's "String Quartet No. 1" and John Kirchner's "String Quartet No. 2."

3 Yale
At Fes
By GORDON E. AR
Three members of Music School faculty to enliven the scene during the ne
so. Composers Gunt ler and Donald Ma have prominent roles day Festival of Con American Music wi
under way there, to the auspices of the Music Center. The ulty member, violinis
Erle, is to be a part invitation in a two-d
Symposium scheduled
16 and 17.
Martino was one of composers commiss write works for the
The Fromm Music F
of Chicago in co-oper
the Berkshire Musi commissioned nine w
the 10th was commis
the Samuel Wechler
sion of New York Ci
the works will rec world premieres thi concerts listed for Monday, Wednesda
Thursday evenings (8
ond work by each of composers honored commissions will als
cluded in the progra
Schuller, of course, tablished composer w rently serving as member of the compo
partment at the Berk
sic Center. His String
No. 1 will be heard
tival concert on Tu
p.m.) when similar other recognized
such as Elliott Carte
Berger, and Leon will be presented.
newly appointed me
the Yale Music Scho who will take up h
here next month, w panel moderator in discussion sessions in the afternoons (2 during the festival.
The main purpose festival of contempora ican music is to fu careers of the 10 yo posers who, while certain areas, have achieved national re
The public will hav
portunity this week their music and aud
the panel discussions be privileged to hear posers discussing su as "Problems of and "Problems of A
A third discussion day afternoon, the fi
the festival, will atte up any loose ends and unresolved in earlier sessions.
Aaron Copland wi charge of all three cussions.
The Fromm Fellow of young instru which is performin porary music at T this summer under from the Fromm (active supporters o ter's contemporary grams since 1956), principal performers program they will be the Tanglewood Choi
ists from the scho
department. The Le tet, formed by a for of Fromm Fellows will give the progra quartets on Tuesda
Incidentally, the o
noon concert (3:30)
tival will be given
This program lists
Berger, Fine, Co
Piston.
All of these eve festival, with the e Tuesday evening's c be open free of Friends of the Ber
sic Center. Anyone come a member of by making a which goes to a fo
port of the schools
The String Symp gets under way will bring to

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 109,204

3 Yale Faculty Members In Limelight At Festival Of Contemporary Music

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

Three members of the Yale Music School faculty will help to enliven the Tanglewood scene during the next week or so. Composers Gunther Schuller and Donald Martino will have prominent roles in a five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music which gets under way there today under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The third faculty member, violinist Broadus Erle, is to be a participant by invitation in a two-day String Symposium scheduled for Aug. 16 and 17.

Martino was one of 10 young composers commissioned to write works for the festival. The Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago in co-operation with the Berkshire Music Center commissioned nine works and the 10th was commissioned by the Samuel Wechler Commission of New York City. All of the works will receive their world premieres this week in concerts listed for tonight, Monday, Wednesday, and Thursday evenings (8). A second work by each of the young composers honored by the commissions will also be included in the programs.

Schuller, of course, is an established composer who is currently serving as a faculty member of the composition department at the Berkshire Music Center. His String Quartet No. 1 will be heard in a festival concert on Tuesday (8 p.m.) when similar works by other recognized composers such as Elliott Carter, Arthur Berger, and Leon Kirchner will be presented. Schuller, newly appointed member of the Yale Music School faculty who will take up his duties here next month, will be a panel moderator in several discussion sessions scheduled in the afternoons (2 o'clock) during the festival.

The main purpose of this festival of contemporary American music is to further the careers of the 10 young composers who, while known in certain areas, have not yet achieved national recognition. The public will have the opportunity this week to hear their music and audiences at the panel discussions will also be privileged to hear the composers discussing such topics as "Problems of Materials" and "Problems of Aesthetics." A third discussion on Thursday afternoon, the final day of the festival, will attempt to tie up any loose ends left over and unresolved in the two earlier sessions. Composer Aaron Copland will be in charge of all three panel discussions.

The Fromm Fellows, a group of young instrumentalists which is performing contemporary music at Tanglewood this summer under fellowships from the Fromm Foundation (active supporters of the center's contemporary music programs since 1956), will be the principal performers. In one program they will be joined by the Tanglewood Choir and soloists from the school's vocal department. The Lenox Quartet, formed by a former group of Fromm Fellows in 1958, will give the program of string quartets on Tuesday evening. Incidentally, the only afternoon concert (3:30) in the festival will be given that day. This program lists works by Berger, Fine, Carter and Piston.

All of these events in the festival, with the exception of Tuesday evening's concert, will be open free of charge to friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Anyone may become a member of this group by making a contribution which goes to a fund for support of the school.

The String Symposium which gets under way next Sunday will bring together some of the nation's finest performers and teachers. They will discuss ways and means of dealing with the threatened shortage of string players. Louis Krasner of Syracuse University will act as chairman of the sessions during which papers touching on various phases of the problem will be read. The Yale fiddler's topic is to be "Pre-Instrumental Training in Solfege and Other Note-Reading Techniques."

GUNTHER SCHULLER, new member of the Yale Music School faculty, leads a rehearsal of Donald Martino's "Concerto for Wind Quartet" which will have its world premiere at Tanglewood Tuesday. Martino, also a Yale Music School faculty member, listens attentively in center.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript-Telegram
Eve. Circ. 26,427
AUG 12 1964

This Music Hath No Charms

People who make fun of modern art just haven't heard modern music. It is so far out that the people who can describe it can't be understood by the people who want to know. It defies traditional criticism and its audience is probably the most esoteric brotherhood in the arts, with the possible exception of addicts of "Finnegan's Wake."

They have been playing modern music at Tanglewood this week, pieces written specially for this festival of contemporary music, and played in the presence of their composers. While the concerts given by the Boston Symphony over the weekends draw audiences of upwards of 5,000, these programs the music center puts on number their listeners in the hundreds. And 900 is a lot of people to subject themselves to this highly experimental musical material.

Old ideas of melody, harmony, and rhythm are as one might expect thrown out the window, along with most of the normal instrumental sounds. Any kind of noise is acceptable material — one is reminded of the junk metal and burlap school of contemporary art — and loud noise is especially popular. There is one kind of modern music that has no structural continuity — its parts can be played in any order. This is like the book that came out recently with unbound pages; it didn't matter what order they were read in.

Most people don't like it. The composers couldn't care less. They get no direct support from the public or any of the mass musical media anyway and must exist as the old masters did on patronage, not of princes, but of such institutional benefactors as the Boston Symphony.

Though this music tries the least to communicate to the public, it is in contemporary step with work in the other arts which is highly experimental and eventually will feed some of its ideas into the permanent artistic record. The main criticism of it is not that it is too radical, but that it is in danger of becoming an introverted conversation, composer writing for composers only. This is something Erich Leinsdorf has already given warning about, and so the goings-on at Tanglewood may not be quite as senseless as they seem.

ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
POUGHKEEPSIE JOURNAL
Sunday, August 9, 1964

Modern American Music Scheduled at Tanglewood

Tonight's Berkshire Festival concert at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will be the first of the five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music. The festival, tonight through Thursday, will feature 12 world premiers and two guest conductors. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, has made known that Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra, and Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Ravinia Festival, have been invited to conduct at the event. Concerts begin at 8 o'clock each night.

This "Festival Within a Festival" is sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. In addition to five performances of new American music, the festival will include three panel discussions moderated by Aaron Copland, head of the music center's composition department. Panelists will include Arthur Berger, Lukas Foss, Leon Kirchner, Gunther Schuller and several of the composers whose works will be premiered during the festival. Nine of the works to be played during the Festival of Contemporary American Music have been commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation and two have been commissioned by Samuel Wechsler.

NEW YORK
Journal American
D. 506,746 SUN. 640,586
AUG 9 1964

A NOBLE IDEA

By MILES KASTENDIECK

ONE MORE ASPECT of the new look at Tanglewood comes into focus tonight: the opening of the Festival of Contemporary American Music. In the light of Erich Leinsdorf's address in June to the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this is a noble experiment. To what extent his words will find an echo in people's reactions to the music performed should provoke much discussion.

●

THE PURPOSE of this festival within the Berkshire Festival is simply to point up interest and place in the spotlight the work of young American composers not yet recognized throughout the land. How well known are the ten whose works will be heard in the four concerts made possible through cooperation from the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, internationally known for supporting contemporary music?

Their names are: Randolph Coleman, of Evanston, Ill.; Donald Martino of New Haven, Conn.; Robert Newell of Urbana, Ill.; John MacIvor Perkins of Chicago, Ill.; Loren Rush of Pt. Richmond, Cal.; Mario Davidovsky, Harvey Sollberger, William Sydeman, David del Tredini, and Charles Wuorien of New York City.

●

THEY HAVE earned the right to be heard. The Berkshire Music Center has commissioned each to write a work for the festival. Each will also have a second work among the four programs. In a sense this will be an ideal hearing for them. Incidentally, Mr. Leinsdorf has listed Sydeman's "Study for Orchestra No. 2" for the regular Boston Symphony concert of Aug. 15.

Three panel discussions during this five-day session will give some insight into compositional motivation and approach. Participating with the ten composers will be Lukas Foss and Leon Kirchner on "Problems of Materials," Gunther Schuller and Arthur Berger on "Problems of Aesthetics," and Aaron Copland, moderator for all of them, on a "General Roundup." If the various angles on contemporary music have not been revealed by then, what else will there remain to uncover?

Two chamber music concerts on Tuesday will set up music by Elliott Carter, Berger, Schuller, Kirchner, Irving Fine, and Walter Piston as some kind of yardstick, for each of these names is well-known among contemporary composers.

Obviously, this festival is an important event; it may set a precedent. If it does, Mr. Leinsdorf will have started something that should clear the haze in the public mind regarding contemporary music, even possibly in the composers' minds about public reaction. What a blessing this would be!

154

The Lively Arts

By Milton R. Bass

THE STRANGE sounds that have been emanating from Tanglewood these past few days are known officially as the "Festival of Contemporary American Music." They will continue through Thursday, and those of you who find yourselves less than attuned to their vibrations should address your complaints to Gunther Schuller in care of the Berkshire Music Center.

* * *

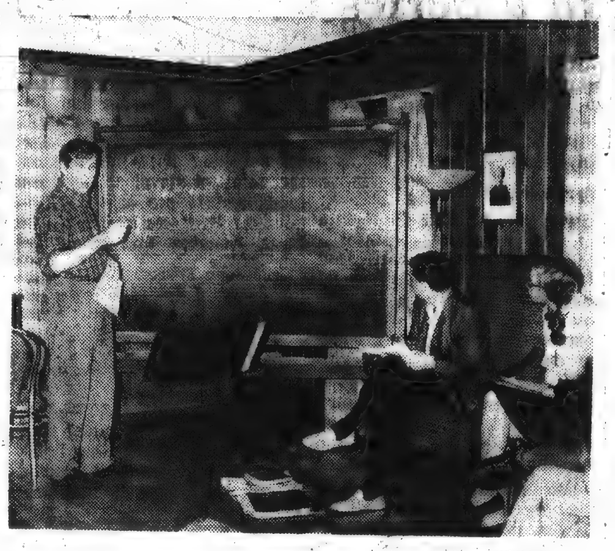
I FIRST MET Gunther Schuller in 1958 when he played first horn for the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra and lectured at the Lenox Jazz School that summer. It was during one of his Jazz School lectures that Gunther first used the term "Third Stream" to describe the possible amalgamations between jazz and classical compositions. The phrase was picked up by the New York Times and an "official" new art form was born.

In 1959, Gunther's talents as a composer afforded him the means to quit his job at the Met and make a living by means of the commissions and royalties his works brought in. Right now he is booked commission-wise up through 1967, and is currently working on a piece for the Canadian Broadcasting Co. that will commemorate Shakespeare's anniversary year. Last Friday night his "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee" was part of the regular program in the big Shed, and more and more in the past few years the works of Schuller have become part of every orchestra's repertoire.

* * *

ALTHOUGH HE is only 38 years old, Gunther Schuller is the completely well-rounded man in music. He has had years of experience as a performer; there are some 60 compositions to his credit; he has done his stint as a conductor; and lately he has been engrossed in teaching. His official title is Acting Head of the Department of Composition, but unofficially he is all over the place.

Besides being a man of multi-musical talents, Gunther is a most engaging, articulate and personable human being. The jazz musicians took to him because he didn't talk down to them from his superior musical background, and respected them for their accomplishments. It was he who first suggested drummer Joe Morello to Dave Brubeck, a suggestion that helped push Brubeck to an unassailable position in the jazz field. It was he who first attempted to fuse the talents of saxophonist Ornette Coleman to the jazz establishment, and the fact that it failed hasn't daunted him in the least.



Whitestone

Gunther Schuller explains serial technique

GUNTHER FEELS just as excited and enthusiastic about the 10 young composers whose works are being aired at Tanglewood this week. The audience for contemporary music has broadened in the past five years, and Gunther considers what has taken place to be almost a musical revolution.

The works these young men are composing, he says, are all more difficult than anything done by Webern or Stravinsky, still considered too "modern" even after all these years. Gunther admits that the average person would walk out on this music after 10 minutes, considering it meaningless noise. But public interest is growing, and the Berkshire Music Center has invited composers from all over the country to hear what is being done in the now-taken-for-granted 12-tone, or serial, technique and the aleatory or improvisational form. The aleatory method of composing has its counterpart in jazz, not rhythmically, but in the method used by composers to work out their forms.

* * *

GUNTHER BLAMES the big, established names in jazz for keeping the young musicians from making their mark in both fame and existence (let alone fortune). He considers the fantastic reaction against advanced jazz to be comparable to the situation in classical music in 1910, when the established names fought to keep the new techniques from getting a hearing.

He is delighted that the Berkshire Music Center, under the sponsorship of Erich Leinsdorf, has now become the world's leading center for advanced music. It may be noise to you, but it's music to his ears. Listen twice before you close your mind as well as your ears, and perhaps you, too, will discover the sound of classical music as it is being written today. There's a revolution on at the Berkshire Music Center this week, and you still have time to man the ramparts.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
Transcript
Eve. Circ. 13,240

AUG 14 1964

Tanglewood Festival On NBC This Sunday

The Festival of Contemporary American Music which concluded yesterday at Tanglewood, Lenox, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be depicted in part as a segment of NBC's "Sunday" program this Sunday from 5 to 6 p.m.

A crew from the "Sunday" program spent two days at Tanglewood filming portions of the "Festival Within a Festival" which featured 12 world premieres. The new music was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago and Samuel Wechsler of New York.

The "Sunday" program will present interviews with Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, and Aaron Copland, chairman of the faculty and head of the Music Center's department of composition. Portions of the rehearsals for this week's contemporary music concerts will also be shown.

The Festival represented, not contemporary music as a whole, but mainly that of the most recent generation of composers. The composers stayed at Tanglewood during the two weeks preceding the Festival working with the performers in preparing their own works. All works by participants have been prepared by the Fromm Fellowship Players under the supervision of Gunther Schuller.

Three of the commissioned works which were premiered at Tanglewood this week will be selected by the Berkshire Music Center Faculty for publication by Associated Music Publishers and be performed at a special Tanglewood concert in New York in the 1964-65 season under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711

AUG 11 1964

Now at Lenox

Contemporary American Music

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

LENOX—The festival of contemporary American music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, and consisting of a series of concerts and panel discussions, has gotten under way with concerts on Sunday and Monday evenings. New pieces have been commisioned from 10 composers, each of whom is also represented by an earlier work, and a few other works such as the Wechsler commissions for 1962 and 1963 have also been included.

Monday evening there was vocal music, beginning with a stabat mater by Daniel Pinkham, director of music at the Kings Chapel. The music, heavily influenced by Britten's "War Requiem," was the most conservative heard on the two concerts. That is nothing to be said against it. If there are to be complaints about the piece, they need to be made on the grounds of almost total non exploitation of the instruments for anything other than uninteresting doublings. Pinkham has really written a plain organ accompaniment, orchestrated for no persuasive reason. Still, he is a thoroughly professional musician, and he has written something that many choirs of fairly modest resources will find useful setting of the stabat mater. It was conducted by Thomas Sokol and Frances Riley sang the soprano solos.

Euripides did not intend an audience to smile at the words, "count no one happy, however fortunate, before he dies." Yet that is the effect that Robert Newell produced in his Euripides travesty, "The Trojan Women." Hie piece was written for soprano, alto, and seven instruments, and from time to time, as in the line I quoted, the instrumentalists had to speak, much as dance band members occasionally do. They were generally unintelligible—talking is not, after all, thier profession and embarrased, which is understandable. Still, that was merely one of the multiple indiscretions of a scandalously inconsistent piece. All the "modern" gimmick were there, and not a suggestion that their compiler had any ability to make anything of them, either musically or in relation to Euripides. The performance was generally chaotic, though there were some good moments from soprano Phyllis Brynjulson.

Miss Brynjulson appeared again to good effect in "Canso" by Stanlys Silverman, a work that made a great hit with the audience. It is for chorus and "plucked consort," that is, harpsichord, harp, guitar, mandolin, some light percussion. There is something very engaging about the directness with which silverman produces a series of effective devices, and "Canso," however slight, is a work of delicacy and charm, imagined by a man with a real ear. It was conducted by Lorna Cooke de Varon, and not the least of the pleasures was in the series of little guitar Cadenzas that the composer wrote for himself to play.

Sydeman was represented on this concert by "The Lament of Elektra," scored for instruments and five choruses (and six conductors). It is musically extremely uncomplicated, though, for the singers are used mainly for a dense counterpoint of independent shoutings, mainly on the word "violence," between these highly effective outbursts comes a series of instrumental duets—not all played with great precision—which are distinctly less interesting than the hubbub surrounding them. Once again Mrs. de Varon conducted the Festival Choir with five sub conductors, and Malama Proudakes was the not quite dependable alto soloist.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 603,574

AUG 12 1964

42 C

Music: Four Contemporary Composers

Works Using Choruses Presented at Lenox

By HOWARD KLEIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10—The second concert in the five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music at Englewood Monday night showed what four young composers can do when given choruses to work with. The results were, in the case of two of the works, quite good; the third was interesting, the fourth was bland.

Three of the works invoked Greek themes, which shows a trend in itself. The fourth was a setting of the "Stabat Mater" by Daniel Pinkham and for several reasons this was the bland work.

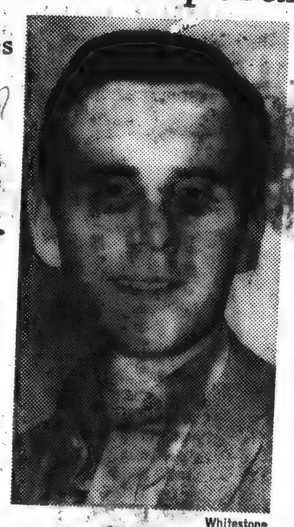
Mr. Pinkham, who is 41 years old, is the music director of King's Chapel in Boston. In the program notes, he states that he "wished to write a concise and accessible choral work." This it is. The chorus sings in a mildly dissonant hymn style while the orchestra merely supports it. The solo line was angular but not interesting. Mr. Pinkham also states in the notes, "I leave it to the musicologist to discover that all of the notes are strictly derived from a single tone row." This was blatantly facetious, since the work was couched in a tonal thinking not too far from Howard Hanson's.

William Sydeman's "The Lament of Elektra," for alto solo and chorus, was, for these ears, the most gripping work. Scored for five small choirs and a chamber orchestra, the serial work managed to convey both particular moods and a sense of growth in a large but very logical design. Theatrical might be a good word for "Elektra," for the effect was extremely dramatic.

It was extremely complex, too, but for once the complexities related themselves to an ingenious over-all form that interrelated all the elements.

Four conductors led the work. Lorna Cooke de Varon was the central one, and the others were each in charge of a small portion. Each had a pocket metronome because, as in one section, the choruses performed at different speeds.

Mr. Sydeman, a 36-year-old New Yorker, is not an innovator in this, nor in the manner in which he has his choruses alternate speech, whispering and singing. He provided strongly independent material for the choruses as well as the instrumentalists and his soloist, Malama Proidakes.



Whitestone

Stanley Silverman

Greek Themes Invoked by 3 Festival Pieces

This work was last year's Wechsler commission. A Wechsler commission of 1962 had its first performance, too: Robert Newell's "The Trojan Women" for soprano and alto soloists and seven instruments.

Mr. Newell, who is from Illinois, is at 24 the youngest of the composers.

His was a nobly conceived but imperfectly realized anti-war piece, which showed imagination in the device of having the players provide the chorus parts. But it was long and static, for its plaintiveness seemed unrelieved by dramatic accent. This was conducted by Michel Piasson with Miss Proidakes and Phyllis Brynjulson, soprano, as soloists.

Stanley Silverman, a 26-year-old New Yorker, has written an ingenious and effective work in his "Canso," a two-section piece for chorus and "plucked consort." Mr. Silverman played guitar in the consort, which also included mandolin, harpsichord, harp, bass viol and Chinese glasses.

Not only did his chorus and soloist (again Miss Brynjulson) have interesting serial material to sing, but this too, like the Sydeman, achieved feelings of mood convincingly and with spare means. Miss de Varion also led this work, which was applauded enthusiastically by the sizable audience.

Tuesday is "old masters" day with two chamber music concerts by such composers as Berger, Carter, Piston, Fine, Schuller and Kichner.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, M
Circ. 83,193

AUG 10 1964

New Sound Opens Stand At Tanglewo

LENOX — The Ne opened a five-day stan Theater at Tanglewood night.

Nearly 1000 Listen

There were nearly 1 teners who showed ranging from fascina complete bonfusion for ing concert of the Fe Contemporary America presented by the Berks sic Center in coopera the Fromm Music Foun

Nine young compose commissioned by the F and one by the Samuel Commission to write ne for the festival.

Three of the comp by the Fromm founde given their first pu formances Sunday.

The others will rec performances Wednes Thursday. The Wedn performance will be along with first perfo works by Daniel Pink Stanley Silverman.

First Performan

Composers honored performances Sunday en Rush of the San Conservatory of Musi Davidovsky of the Princeton Electronic M ter and Charles Wuor director of the Columb for contemporary mus

Three other work played Sunday. All w acterized by the styl terns common among porary works organize ing to atonal, rules.

The most frequently struments were percu the most frequently hea were spasms of qui fragmented melodies, pieces of sound seemi tered at random and long, steady, quiet not

All six of the compo in the audience and w forward to acknowledg es.

Identify Soun

Following is an attem tify the sort of sound ing each of the six the program Sunday appearance.

William Sydeman's flute, violin, clarinet was about 16 minutes and agitation. Most the players exceeding a seemingly uncontrol of sound.

Loren Rush's Nex volved 17 players and instruments. The started a stop watch started the music, arms slowly in an e lar reproduction of t the stopwatch in fro and the players work struments according tion of the conduct arms. The sound th covered the entire possibilities of loud short, many few and lence in any combina 25 instruments.

Caprice 19

John MacIvor Perk ano piece, Caprice performed by Easlye who commissioned it was highly percus rhythmic and diss out being discordant There were plateaus and speed and many strings of widely sp timed notes.

Harvey Sollberg quartet for flutes eight minutes. It the sounds contem players are capable from formerly gen ments — squeeks, w ters and pops. Ther orthodox flute sour long gradual cres ing to frightful fren

Mario Davidovsk isms No. 2 for fl violin, cello and blended caref licks, pops, cr and rasps from with the whistles, h nd dulcet tones e quartet of p the strange somehow estab der without a ble reason.

Charles Wuo certo for flute ed 18 instrume e except the

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193

AUG 10 1964

New Sound Opens Stand At Tanglewood

LENOX — The New Sound opened a five-day stand in the Theater at Tanglewood Sunday night.

Nearly 1000 Listeners

There were nearly a 1000 listeners who showed reactions ranging from fascination to complete confusion for the opening concert of the Festival of Contemporary American Music, presented by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

Nine young composers were commissioned by the foundation and one by the Samuel Wechsler Commission to write new works for the festival.

Three of those commissioned by the Fromm foundation were given their first public performances Sunday.

The others will receive first performances Wednesday and Thursday. The Wechsler first performance will be tonight, along with first performances of works by Daniel Pinkham and Stanley Silverman.

First Performances

Composers honored by first performances Sunday were Loren Rush of the San Francisco Conservatory of Music, Mario Davidovsky of the Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center and Charles Wuorinen, co-director of the Columbia group for contemporary music.

Three other works were played Sunday. All were characterized by the stylistic patterns common among contemporary works organized according to atonal, asymmetrical rules.

The most frequently used instruments were percussive and the most frequently heard sounds were spasms of quick notes, fragmented melodies, bits and pieces of sound seemingly scattered at random and very, very long, steady, quiet notes.

All six of the composers were in the audience and were called forward to acknowledge applauses.

Identify Sound

Following is an attempt to identify the sort of sound heard during each of the six pieces on the program Sunday in order of appearance.

William Sydeman's Quartet for flute, violin, clarinet and piano was about 16 minutes of density and agitation. Most of it kept the players exceedingly busy in a seemingly uncontrolled frenzy of sound.

Loren Rush's Nexus 16 involved 17 players and 25 musical instruments. The conductor started a stop watch when he started the music, moved his arms slowly in an exact circular reproduction of the arms of the stopwatch in front of him, and the players worked their instruments according to the position of the conductor's clock arms. The sound that emerged covered the entire variety of possibilities of loud soft, long short, many few and sound silence in any combination of the 25 instruments.

Caprice 1963

John MacIvor Perkins solo piano piece, Caprice 1963, was performed by Easlye Blackwood, who commissioned it. The piece was highly percussive, polyrhythmic and dissonant without being discordant or chaotic. There were plateaus of volume and speed and many gamboling strings of widely spaced, evenly timed notes.

Harvey Sollberger's grand quartet for flutes lasted about eight minutes. It depicted all the sounds contemporary flute players are capable of drawing from formerly gentle instruments — squeeks, whistles, flutters and pops. There were also orthodox flute sounds and two long gradual crescendos leading to frightful frenzies.

Mario Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 2 for flute, clarinet, violin, cello and tape recorder blended carefully controlled clicks, pops, crackles, wheezes and rasps from loud speakers with the whistles, bleats, scrapes and dulcet tones available from the quartet of players. In spite of the strange sounds, the piece somehow established a sense of order without an easily recognizable reason.

Charles Wuorninen's chamber concerto for flute and 10 players used 13 instruments, all percussive except the flute and a dou-

Music Review

BERKSHIRE EAGLE 8/10/64

Festival of Contemporary Music

THE FESTIVAL of Contemporary American Music which the Berkshire Music Center is presenting in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation is one of the most significant features of the current Tanglewood season.

There will be a total of five concerts in the Theater Concert Hall (the first of which was last night), all except the Tuesday evening program by the Fromm Fellows, a group which the Foundation has organized and sponsored at the Center all season. The Lenox Quartet, which grew out of an association of Fromm Fellows of previous years, will play Tuesday.

* * *

LAST NIGHT'S program was typical of all that are listed. All the composers, born between 1928 and 1938, were present to acknowledge the enthusiastic reception their music received. The evening began with a short word of welcome from Aaron Copland, chairman of the Center faculty, and he asked Paul Fromm, who was in the audience, to stand. The audience gave the founder a remarkably enthusiastic welcome, indicating the appreciation they have for the purposes of these concerts.

Each work was for a different combination of instruments. Three of them were Fromm commissions and were receiving first performances. This new music requires a whole new set of standards and several lectures on semantics. The festival will provide just that Wednesday and Thursday afternoons at 2. The subjects will be concerned with "Problems of Materials" and "Problems of Aesthetics," and the panelists will be distinguished composers and educators.

* * *

THE MEANS of producing sounds and the use of existing instruments are so strange in these concerts that it is difficult to attempt to convey the idea without appearing to ridicule them. But the "Nexus 16" by Loren Rush was, if I may be permitted the expression, for 8 stagehands and 16 musicians. (The disposition of the instruments could be done with a little more forethought and deftness.) Eduardo Mata was the conductor. He had a stopwatch above his score, and his esoteric brachial motions were new to this veteran concertgoer. He first raised both hands over his head, as if for a high dive, and then let them descend with measured procrastination. In other words: Slow motion.

The players understood this, however, and were allowed a certain freedom within this time element to sound what they thought fitting and appropriate. It was not clear what the printed page may have signaled. Mr. Rush is quoted that "Mandala music is more a kind of musician's erector set than a musical composition." The resulting relationships range from casual to chance. "Each event or detail has the possibility of simultaneous appearance."

* * *

THE REACTION of by far the greater share of the large audience indicated that this was their language. There is no longer any concurrence of tones which can shock us. We must search for a message or a purpose, a goal or some set of standards by which a musical surveyor can establish recognizable bench marks. There could be no more benevolent auspices for such a project than those which the Fromm Foundation is now making possible this week at Tanglewood.

J.C.R.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

AUG 10 1964

Contemporary Music Fete Opens at Tanglewood

Big Audience Is Greeted by Copland—Works of 3 Composers Offered

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9—Aaron Copland welcomed the audience that came to the theater-concert hall at Tanglewood tonight to hear the opening concert in the five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music with the words, "This is a very auspicious event."

Five days of concerts, open rehearsal and panel discussions are being presented by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. The idea was to bring 10 young composers to Tanglewood, commission each to write a work and play the commissioned pieces as well as other of their works in four concerts.

The Fromm Foundation has been active on behalf of contemporary music here since 1956, but this is the first time a separate festival has been made of the Fromm concerts.

The composers chosen represent the main trends in contemporary music. Nine of them are between 24 and 36 years old. The 10th, Daniel Pinkham is 41. Six have been heard in New York during the last five years, and it can be said that they truly represent the current fashions in composing.

A large audience turned out for the opening concert, and judging from the positive reactions to the works it was a sophisticated and knowledgeable one.

Three of the commissioned works were heard, "Nexus 16" by Loren Rush, "Synchronisms No. 2" for flute, clarinet, violin and viola and tape recorder by Mario Davidovsky and the Chamber Concerto for flute and 10 players by Charles Wuorinen.

Mr. Rush, a 29-year-old Californian who has studied with Seymour Shifrin and Andrew Imbrie and who teaches at the San Francisco Conservatory of Music, has concocted in his "Nexus 16" an example of chance music similar in style to those written by Morton Feldman. An elaborate work calling for a large battery of percussion plus 12 string, wind and brass players, it consists of a grouping of four "occasions" with approximate durations of 6 minutes, 35 seconds, 1 minute and 4 minutes.

Eduardo Mata conducted, using a stop watch as his guide, by imitating the movement of the second hand with his arms—left down slowly, then right up. This produced a hypnotic effect, for his movement exactly paralleled the watch's. The sounds were extremely diverse, spurts coming from all directions and instruments. But the total effect was not cohesive.

Mr. Davidovsky, a 30-year-old Argentinian, pursued a course familiar to him in several recent works, that of combining conventional instruments with synthesized sounds. Two acoustic suspension speakers flanked the quarter in this "Synchronisms No 2," intermingling their sounds with those of the players. The marrying of tape to live sounds has fascinated other composers, and while this work seemed a successful marriage, it was not ideal. The tape world is so brilliant, its sounds make conventional instruments appear lackluster.

But part of contemporary music is esthetic experimentation. No procedure or medium is too remote for investigation. Many of these works are like laboratory experiments that end up being recorded for later reference and then discontinued.

Mr. Wuorinen, a 26-year-old New Yorker, who is no stranger to New York programs, provided a new work that was no stranger to those familiar with his serial style.

His Chamber Concerto, which had Harvey Sollberger as solo flutist, was complex but the components seemed to be fragments of only one line. Single ideas were spread out among several instruments, Bach contributing one fragment.

Since all the players seemed engrossed in only one idea, it seemed redundant to have so many occupied when one could have done as well.

The balance of the program was of familiar works. The most satisfying was William Sydeman's Quartet for flute, violin, clarinet and piano, which is a dramatically cohesive work strong on musicality.

John MacIvor Perkins's Caprice for piano was brilliantly played by another composer, Easley Blackwood. Harvey Sollberger's Grand Quartet for flutes was inventive and well played, with the composer as first flutist.

The coming programs look promising, as do the discussions, which will have Lukas Foss, Leon Kirchner, Gunter Schuller and Arthur Berger as panelists. Mr. Copland will be moderator.

Mr. Schuller, the acting head of the department of composition, which is headed by Mr. Copland, is the supervisor of the Fromm Fellowship Players and he is to be commended for the high-level performances which he rehearses.

HOWARD KLEIN

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193

AUG 11 1964

Complex Works Featured at Lenox Festival

Second in Tanglewood Contemporary Series Said Wild

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—The second in Tanglewood's series of five evenings of contemporary music was a vocal one; it was, also, depending upon the point of view, of course, a wild one.

Works for Choruses

Four complex works for choruses, solo voices and a wide variety of instruments were presented Monday night in the theater as the second program in the festival of contemporary American music being sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

The works were sabat mater for soprano solo and chorus by Daniel Pinkham, "The Trojan Women" for soprano and alto soloists and seven instruments by Robert Newell, "Canso" for soprano soloist and chorus by Stanley Silverman and "The Lament of Electra" for alto solo and chorus by William Sydeman.

All composers were present and acknowledged approval by the audience of about 900.

First Performances

The works receiving first public performances were those by Pinkham, Silverman and Sydeman.

The Sydeman work, commissioned for the festival by the Samuel Wechlser Commission, was the most spectacular with its five choruses and six conductors, but it was last in order of appearance.

First was Pinkham's 15 minute "Stabat Mater." Its 50-voice chorus was augmented by an orchestra of 19 players. It established a stark, sombre, slow and rather austere atmosphere with dense, tightly chromatic chords and long, long, slightly dissonant, floating combinations of notes accented by thumps from the kettledrums and rings from bells.

Wear Black Robes

Newell's "Trojan Women" was 24 minutes of stylized ceremonial. The alto and soprano wore black choir robes and alternately stood alone at the side of the stage with their backs to the audience while the others were singing. They were Hecuba, Andromache, Cassandra and a "congregation of women" who expressed their anquished response to war at the altar of Ares, god of war. The seven instruments were violin, flute clarinet, kettledrums, double bass, French horn and trumpet.

It was an off-beat cantata involving singing, chanting, talking and humming. The words were unintelligible, and if the program had not explained in lucid English why the women were unhappy, no one would have known.

The Silverman canso had a chorus of 50 voices assisted by a large collection of instruments, all played percussively, sometimes loudly, but mostly gently. The instruments were mandolin, guitar, harpsichord, harp, double-bass, gourd and Chinese chimes.

The sequence of sounds involved vocal slides and swoops, phrases in meglo monotone a sensitive, melodic and elliptical guitar solo played by the composer and many sudden shifts in direction.

Long Audience Response

It lasted 30 minutes and was, perhaps too long, but it generated a large and long response from the audience.

After intermission Sydesman's incredible "Lament of Electra" captured the curiosity and interest of the audience. Three of the five choruses were on stage, two were at the ends of the stage on the stairs leading to the auditorium floor. There were 16 instrumentalists spread along a line in front of the choruses. In the curved middle space were five seated conductors with stop watches, one for each chorus and its accompanying instrumentalists.

On the podium in the center of the tumult was the controlling conductor. She was Lorna Cooke de Varon, and her main responsibility seemed to be to set each department in motion at the right time and tempo and turn it over to its conductor when her attention was needed elsewhere.

Her other responsibilities were more complicated. One result was that each group sang, talked, shouted or chanted at different speeds and rhythms (or no rhythms) and in different combinations.

The "music" started with whispering unison speech and ended with the same. Between were some exceedingly exciting moments as well as some dull ones.

The most exciting, perhaps, came very soon after the beginning, before the listener had an opportunity to become accustomed to the game.

Said Anticlimactic

The opening unison whispering gradually increased in volume to talk, loud talk, shouting and ear splitting screaming to stop in a gigantic crash from the bass drum and gong and lead into a lonely solo-alto duet.

After that everything was interesting but anticlimactic.

Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

AUG 1 1 1964

Tanglewood's Youth Week

By Eric Salzman

LENOX, Mass.

Tanglewood, the Berkshire music center, is getting a dose of the newest new music—a whole week of the stuff and most of it by young Americans.

"Young" in this case really means young. William Sydeman, the best known of the group is, at 36, the old man. There are nine others—brought here by the Fromm Foundation which is helping to put on this new-music festival—all but one of them under 30.

Monday night's opening program was a fair sample of what's going on, a long, wild and not-so-woolly kick-off to the week that will be—far out and gone, that is.

Three of the pieces were commissioned by Fromm for the series and two turned out very well indeed. One of them, "Synchronisms" No. 2 for flute, clarinet, violin, cello and tape recorder by Mario Daidosky, is—unlikely as it may sound—a little gem of a piece. In spite of the implication of the title, the work is based on juxtapositions of inventive live and tape sounds which approach each other in pattern and timbre, often overlapping in time and texture. It is a clever, elegant and appealing study made with perfect great skill and perfect form.

The big new piece was Charles Wuorinen's chamber concerto for flute and ten players. Wuorinen, an enormously gifted young man, is one of the few younger composers who has doggedly worked at the problem of big gesture and big form. His music has never been short on imagination but his conceptions have been too inconsistent and his forms too incoherent to bear the weight of the fat content.

But the new piece works. Written for the flutist-composer Harvey Sollberger, it grows right out of the extraordinary range of Sollberger's flute sound and technique which is made to emerge gradually from the ensemble play of intensities and textures.

Sollberger was represented as a composer by his "Grand Quartet for Flutes" of 1962, dedicated to, no less, the memory of that great old flutist-composer Friedrich Kuhlau (why not Frederick the Great, who was a king to boot?). It is a charming bit of occasional music with beautiful managed timbres and articulations, but somewhat incompletely formed ideas and shapes.

The third Fromm commission, Nexus 16, by Loren Rush, is part written out, part happenstance — closed form, open contents. The conductor serves as a big clock (hands spiral round, 60 seconds to a sweep) while the players fit some rather scrappy and indeterminate bits in between. There is either too much leeway or perhaps not enough; at any rate, nothing except some amusing Mickey Mouse sounds left over from "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

John Macior Perkins' caprice for piano is a well made serial sort of piece, serious, solid, a little stolid, anything but capricious. William Sydeman was represented by a quartet for flute, violin, clarinet and piano, a busy, busy piece of Boulezian color chromaticism and line, fast, free and footloose. It is attractive up to a point, but the discrepancy between the content and the form is uncomfortable.

Sydeman got another innings last night with his "Lament of Elektra," a big dramatic cantata for alto, five small choruses, a similarly divided chamber ensemble and six conductors. There is a pack of avant-garde devices in it including speaking, whispering, hissing, shouting, murmuring and babbling in a furious whirlwind of different simultaneous determinate and indeterminate tempos and meters.

This was Greek tragedy night, courtesy of the Wechsler Foundation which commissioned the Sydeman and Robert Newell's "The Trojan Women" for soprano, as well. This work also has its share of portentous whispering to the great embarrassment of all concerned. For the rest, the work is a styleless bit of musical mismanagement.

Stanley Silverman's canto for soprano, choirs and instruments was perhaps the most suggestive and imaginative work of the evening in its beautiful use of a big, block-like choral sound cut across — and sometimes under—by the delicate tracery of an ensemble of plucked—and—percussion instruments. The conception is not just quiet complete—as if these were studies or excerpts from a larger work—but the ideas and the way they are set into a careful, elegant, expressive shape give the music real character and style.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711

AUG 1 2 1964

Berger, Carter Quartets Feature Lenox Program

LENOX—On Tuesday, two concerts were presented as part of the Berkshire Music Center Fromm Foundation Festival of Contemporary American music. In the afternoon there was a student concert at which Arthur Berger's Woodwind quartet, Irving Fine's string quartet, Elliott Carter's Woodwind quintet, and Walter Pistons S piano quartet were played.

In the evening — and this was also part of the regular Tuesday night chamber series —the Lenox string quartet also gave a concert of music by the old masters; Elliot Carter's Quartet No. 2, Arthur Berger's Quartet, Gunther Schuller's Quartet No. 1, and Leon Kirchner's Quartet No. 2. This retraced history all the way back to 1957, (Schuller), and the newest of the pieces was Kirchner's (1960).

Carters Quartet and Berger's are in fascinating contrast. WhenI first came to know the Berger I was struck by many parallels with the Carter. Which it historically precedes. In direct juxtaposition, as on this program, the differences become enormously apparent.

Both works base their dialectic and their rhetoric on the imposing upon the instruments of certain characteristics, even personalities. Both, and on repeated hearing I would say especially the Berger, are extraordinarily resourceful, imaginative, and fresh in their writing for the medium.

Yet the sense of motion, of gait, is entirely different in the two pieces. The ebb and flow of the Carter as against the sharply clipped articulations seem almost like a confrontation of Grahms and Haydn.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

AUG 1 2 1964

Music: All Contemporary

Pulitzer Prize Work of 1960 Performed as Festival Reaches Halfway Point

By HOWARD KLEIN

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 11—Two concerts marked the midway point in the Festival of Contemporary American Music at Tanglewood today. Both events followed the theme of the festival by presenting eight works by six established composers, and in doing so served to point up the avant-gardism of the 10 younger men whose works are being given on the four other concerts.

Elliot Carter and Arthur Berger had a piece at afternoon and evening programs and in each case the afternoon work was sunny and the evening one was sober.

●

Mr. Carter's Quintet for Woodwinds (1948) is a prankish work full of jerky dance rhythms, vintage 1920. But the String Quartet No. 2, which won the Pulitzer Prize following its premiere in 1960, is a remarkable, dense, powerful piece admitting no nonsense.

The Lenox String Quartet, which was born here several years ago, was the group playing the quartets in the evening concert. As usual, their work was dedicated, concentrated and expressive. The afternoon works were done by members of the instrumental department of the Berkshire Music Center.

Mr. Berger, who is 52 years old and composer in residence here this year, had his Woodwind Quartet in C (1949) played this afternoon. He was overheard telling a colleague that the work was from his "happy California days," and indeed the work reflected happiness in its lively, playful rhythms and clear textures.

His 1958 String Quartet of the Evening had some light moments but in general its six movements were introspective. Both works were concerted in that all the players worked toward the same ends, rather than striking to individual courses as in the Carter Pulitzer quartet.

The other afternoon pieces were one movement of the late Irving Fine's 1953 String Quartet, a passionate and very musical work; and Walter Piston's Piano Quartet.

Written this year by the 70-year old Mr. Piston, the quartet is a case of a composer who would rather fight than switch. Unlike other senior composers who have followed the serial trend—Stravinsky and Copland, for example—Mr. Piston's style has remained comfortably conservative.

●

The most recently written of all the pieces, in both instances his, was paradoxically the most out-dated.

Gunther Schuller's Quartet No. 1 (1957) and Leon Kirchner's String Quartet No. 2 (1960) completed the evening program.

Mr. Schuller, the youngest of the day's composers at 38, joined the Lenox Quartet for five curtain calls in response to the sustained applause. He is acting head of the Department of Composition, is a formidable musician and a very popular figure here.

His quartet was posed and delicate, improvisatory in feeling and quite effective as string music.

Its three movements were full of surprises and yet there was a logical feeling of growth throughout. The evaporation effect at the ending was right, too, for the ephemeral sounding work. Mr. Schuller may have been the best liked personality, but Mr. Kirchner's quartet was the best received of the four, drawing choruses of bravos. Partisan feelings run high here though, and there was at least one strong boo just to restore balance.

●

For this listener, Mr. Kirchner has supplied the meatiest and most immediately satisfying work of all. Poignance and sweetness were qualities along with serenity and a settled feeling. But there was a rhythmic urgency that gave the work a forceful dimension. It did not seem spontaneously written, but one in which logic predominated with some surprises here and there.

All of the works utilized familiar and by no means far-out materials of composing. Hearing the works together in the midst of a festival such as this made on realize just how far the younger generation has moved from these works. And the gap is widening.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193

AUG 1 2 1964

Lenox Quartet In Program At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The Lenox String Quartet, a young and highly talented group which draws its name from this town, played the third program Tuesday night in the festival of contemporary American music under way this week at Tanglewood.

Seventh in Series

The concert was also the seventh in the regular Tuesday night chamber music series in the Theater.

Three members of the group first met in 1959 when they were at Tanglewood for the season as Fromm fellows to study and perform contemporary music under the sponsorship of the Fromm Music Foundation.

The foundation is sponsor, also, of this week's five-day contemporary music festival within the Berkshire Festival, and the Lenox Quartet, which has become a nationally known performing group of first rate stature, provided Tuesday a powerful demonstration of the success of the foundation's efforts. It played the difficult scores with a high order of professional craftsmanship.

The program was Elliot Carter's Second String Quartet, Arthur Berger's String Quartet Gunther Schuller's String Quartet and Leon Kirchner's Second String Quartet.

Called to Stage

Berger, Kirchner and Schuller were in the audience (955) and were called to the stage to receive applause. Also in the audience was Paul Fromm of Chicago, founder of the sponsoring foundation.

The four quartets on the program had the similarities of an group of pieces written in the same style, in this case mid 20th Century atonalism using the 12-tone system as a point of departure.

The sound was caustic and dry, sometimes deliberately shaggy, sometimes as austere as a 100-acre concrete airfield. There was a biting, uncompromising demand in the music easily met by the performers but less easily satisfied by the listeners. It was like olives gobbled by some listeners, tolerated without being tasted by others and, by those trying to learn to like it, tasted once again.

The members of the quartet played with a coordination of timing that seemed to be controlled by one mind. This unity is a requirement for qualification as a first rate ensemble but it is not always shown with contemporary music by groups which have established reputations with more traditional music.

Afternoon Program

Earlier Tuesday, in the afternoon, 17 youthful members of the Berkshire Music Center's study groups presented a program of contemporary music in the Chamber Music Hall.

The program was Berger's Woodwind Quartet (1941), Fine's String Quartet (1953), Carter's Woodwind Quintet (1948) and Piston's Piano Quartet (1964).

Berger's woodwind piece showed a happy baroque quality as if it had been written by an 18th Century eccentric and the Carter quintet showed similar, but more recent, quirkiness. The string and piano quartets were full of the substantial meat and potatoes heard in the evening concert, and the performers sounded nearly as professional.

NEW ENGLAND
Box 2078, Boston
PITTSFIELD, MA
Berkshire Eagl
Eve. Circ. 2

AUG 12 1964

Music Review

The Len

By JAY C. ROSEN

THE REGULAR evening chamber m cert last night at was the fulcrum of U of Contemporary Mus the Fromm Music Fou sponsoring in cooper the Berkshire Music C Lenox Quartet, four uates of the "Fromm which the Foundation es at Tanglewood was the performing They have adopted th the community in first met for artisti tion and have gone on an international They are Peter Theodora Mantz, Hersh, viola, and Call, cello.

THE PROGRAM a formidable intelle cise. Comment on cert should be prece ample space were than a journal prov semantic discussion some sort of agreem ty" and "expression." four quartets on th and all the compo Elliott Carter were Carter's quartet, began the evening. to convey "separ even suggests that sit less close than custom on stage may be heard as The Lenox plays conviction, a basic in so disjointed a conveyed the impr collage. Indeed, contemporary itself into any its allied art.

The Carter is pause, and it take to discern when one mood to anoth

Herald
D. 282,005 SUN. 36

AUG 1 3 1964

Ta

Tanglewood
By Eric Salzm
LENOX

Another fine contemporary mus place here last night ing three new-from tion commissions. score: a knockout, a and a flop.

The knockout Sollberger's chamb tions, a big, big pi out of a kaleidoscop ing, twitching, in sounds set in an open space. There a dictory, overwrou in this music; gra not taken into th tion; discrepancie the remarkable a accent, color, rh texture on the one the choice and m of the pitches an space on the oth conception is ex and enough to s things into an ov whole.

Dadd del Tredi an Army" (a Joy soprano and strin the first piece composer heard this current, contr music festival wi Avant-Garde e escape the u holing. It is fre with centrifug terwining impet ries the music series of intense cycles of rep around the presaive vocal

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

AUG 12 1964

Music Review

The Lenox Quartet Plays Contemporary

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE REGULAR Tuesday evening chamber music concert last night at Tanglewood was the fulcrum of the Festival of Contemporary Music which the Fromm Music Foundation is sponsoring in cooperation with the Berkshire Music Center. The Lenox Quartet, four post-graduates of the "Fromm Fellows," which the Foundation establishes at Tanglewood each year, was the performing ensemble. They have adopted the name of the community in which they first met for artistic cooperation and have gone on to acquire an international reputation. They are Peter Marsh and Theodora Mantz, violins, Paul Hersh, viola, and Donald McCall, cello.

* * *

THE PROGRAM proved to be a formidable intellectual exercise. Comment on such a concert should be preceded, if more ample space were available than a journal provides, by a semantic discussion to come to some sort of agreement on "beauty" and "expression." There were four quartets on the program, and all the composers except Elliott Carter were in the hall.

Carter's quartet, his second, began the evening. Carter aims to convey "separations." He even suggests that the players sit less close than is the usual custom on stage so that the may be heard as distinct unit The Lenox plays with fearless conviction, a basic requiremen in so disjointed a work. The conveyed the impression of a collage. Indeed, the subject o contemporary painting injects itself into any consideration of its allied art.

The Carter is played without pause, and it takes a keen ear to discern when it moves from one mood to another except, of course, in the andante, where an atmosphere of comparative contentment becomes sensitized. Very unusual cadenzas, solo for the first violin while the others played in coordination, interrupted at haphazard intervals.

* * *

CONTEMPORARY American music falls into three more or less indeterminate divisions. There is the school and the era, not necessarily synonyms, of Copland; then there is the group of composers only lately free of academic guidance; and then there is a middle group, in which all the names on last night's program belong.

By comparison, Arthur Berger's quartet, which followed the Carter, was tightly coherent. Its outlines and limits, by juxtaposition, are discernible. He also seems to have the potentialities of the instruments he uses more in mind than in the music played preceding his. There are no breaks between movements, but there is a wide range of character envisioned.

* * *

THE GUNTHER Schuller quartet, his first, was the most transparent of all. There is little within to obstruct one's musical vision. As in the "Klee Pictures," which was played for orchestra last week, there is a sort of photographic conveyance attempted. There is a suspicion of color moods, but they are vacuous at best and are mere musical doodling. The cohesiveness of the music may be partially gauged from the fact that the musicians had to use miniature scores to know where their colleagues were. He used the same materials he employed in the "Klee," a painter whose interests in music ended, unfortunately with his career, with Hindemith and Stravinsky. The mentality of Jackson Pollock finds empathy in today's writing, in the youngest group, but there is definite agreement between music current painting all along the line.

* * *

THE LEON Kirchner quartet, his second, bears the unpardonable stigma of having something to say. It has depth, and in the agitated movements the excitement seems to come from an inner warmth and fire. Also, it was patently for string quartet, and did not resort often, if at all, to the devices which tax the potential of the instruments, such as isolated harmonics and lonely plucked notes.

All the composers present were called to the stage by the Lenox Quartet to share the extreme enthusiasm the music found in the favorably prejudiced audience.

NEW YORK Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

AUG 13 1964

Tanglewood: A Sollberger KO

Tanglewood music

By Eric Salzman

LENOX, Mass.

Another king-size bout of contemporary music took place here last night including three new-from-foundation commissions. The box score: a knockout, a fine piece and a flop.

The knockout was Harvey Sollberger's chamber variations, a big, big piece made out of a kaleidoscope of shifting, twitching, intertwining sounds set in an immense open space. There are contradictory, overwrought things in this music; grand gestures not taken into the conception; discrepancies between the remarkable and powerful accent, color, rhythm and texture on the one hand and the choice and management of the pitches and the time space on the other. But the conception is extraordinary and enough to absorb these things into an overwhelming whole.

Daid del Tredicis "I Hear an Army" (a Joyce text) for soprano and string quartet is the first piece by a young composer heard so far on this current, continuing new-music festival which is un-Avant-Garde enough to really escape the usual pigeonholing. It is freely chromatic, with centrifugal spinning, interwining impetus that carries the music forward in a series of intense, overlapping cycles of repetition built around the long-lined, expressive vocal part. In its way, it is a very impressive achievement by a talented composer working out his own way of saying things outside the "mainstreams."

Randolph Coleman's piano concerto begins inside the guts of the piano, moves on to improvisation and more or less serializes its way to a bang-up finish, bouncing and crashing off the piano strings. Avant-Garde? Not a bit. All this fancy horseplay surrounds a weak, odd, confused musical muddle in the middle.

There were three other works on the program. Mario Daidovsky's "Synchronisms" No. 1 for flute and tape record (marvelously played by the irrepressible Mr. Sollberger) is a most attractive work. A kind of elegant scherzo in a concertante style. The Donald Martino trio for violin, clarinet and piano is a strong serial work with an intense, finely worked twelve-tone structure. This kind of intellectual finesse has not been the strong point of every work on this festival.

Loren Rush's mandala music is a kind of improvisation scheme (Mandala? Mandorla? Almond-shaped? Oval? The schema in the score is, however, arranged in circles) neatly and amusingly realized by a group of swinging performers.

The performances had several extremes: The difficult Sollberger went on a reef one-third of the way through and had to be relaunched by conductor Gunther Schuller. The second run-through was not all smooth sailing either, by any means. Eduardo Mata was the excellent conductor in the Coleman and Phyllis Brynjulson was the very impressive soloist in the Tredici, handling a huge range of rushing, leaping, skidding lines with great aplomb and even vocal beauty.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

AUG 13 1964

Music Theater Movies TV Art

Music Review

Contemporary Music Festival

By ANDREW CLARKE

THE FIFTH concert of contemporary music in the week-long festival presently in progress at Tanglewood performed last night, was a challenging recipe for even the most devoted gourmet of new sounds.

Of the six compositions heard, three had been commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation, sponsor of the festival, and so were being premiered. I found some of the works to be very interesting; others, frankly, unsuccessful. Invariably, the works I find either incomprehensible or boring are those that reject almost entirely attempts to wrtie linearly. Thus when a row is presented in the briefest of one-note utterances in every conceivable register by every instrument on stage, and when this technique is continued, the work can ultimately only have any real meaning for the composer and performers, who know it inside and out.

* * *

THE MOST intriguing piece of the evening was the first — Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No. 1, for Flute and Tape Recorder." The electronic portion successfully incorporated a wide variety of sounds, including squeals, water bubbles, muted harpsichord strings and bongo drums, to name a few. Set against these, in what was at times beautiful counterpoint, were the lines of the solo flute. The work had classical symmetry and combined moments of tenderness with several violent outbursts, and while the full range of the flute's capabilities was explored, the piece never got out of hand. Soloist Harvey Sollberger was outstanding.

Next on the program was Donald Martino's "Trio for Violin, Clarinet and Piano," one of the composer's most frequently performed works. Dialogue between the instruments is used to good effect, particularly that exchanged by the violin and the flute. The piano is definitely the outsider in this combination, and its role is limited largely to percussive accompaniment. I didn't feel it constituted a completely homogeneous element. Nevertheless, the work is notable for its interesting rhythmic nuances and subtle tone coloring.

* * *

"CONCERTO for Piano and Chamber Orchestra," by Randolph Coleman, was the first of the commissioned works heard. It began, in an uncharacteristic fashion for an atonal piece, with the use of a sustained F sharp which all the instruments sounded sporadically. In other words, the piece had a sort of built-in tuning device, and unfortunately it revealed that the instruments were not entirely in tune with each other. But after this striking beginning, the composition broke down into the kind of writing I complained about earlier. There was considerable experimentation with the resources of each instrument, and at times the composer seemed almost to be writing tongue-in-cheek, but the work left no lasting impression.

* * *

AFTER intermission, the audience heard what was perhaps the most unsuccessful work of the evening — Loren Rush's "Mandala Music — Improvisation for Three or More Performers." The two outstanding defects of this composition are that the mandala is completely overshadowed by the other instruments, and that the composer obviously gave little thought to the physical demands on the performers themselves. The poor percussion men were frantically running around between drums, cymbals and a xylophone until the audience finally began tittering, quite justifiably I think, and the visual aspect practically became a preoccupation.

David del Tredici's "I Hear an Army," for soprano and string quartet, made for enjoyable listening however. The poem, written by James Joyce, is loaded with opportunities for madrigalisms and the composer took full advantage of them. Words like "plunging" and "shouting" were given imaginative treatment, and the music itself suggested the themes of an army rampaging and a woman despairing as succinctly as anyone could wish. My only complaint was that the very long epiloge was anticlimactic, although it was obviously written to balance an equally lengthy prologue.

* * *

THE FINAL work was Harvey Sollberger's "Chamber Variations for Twelve Players and Conductor," which, along with "I Hear an Army," were the other two Fromm commissions. Again, this work is highly fragmentary and in addition, lengthy. It failed to hold my attention simply because of little variation in either tempi or in the instrumental techniques used.

As usual, the Fromm Fellowship Players were in good form throughout the concert.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4300
Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 603,574
AUG 13 1964

Music: All Contemporary

Pulitzer Prize Work of 1960 Performed as Festival Reaches Halfway Point

By HOWARD KLEIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 11—Two concerts marked the midway point in the Festival of Contemporary American Music at Tanglewood Tuesday. Both events followed the theme of the festival by presenting eight works by six established composers, and in doing so served to point up the avant-gardism of the 10 younger men whose works are being given on the four other concerts.

Elliot Carter and Arthur Berger had a piece at afternoon and evening programs and in each case the afternoon work was sunny and the evening one was sober.

●

Mr. Carter's Quintet for Woodwinds (1948) is a prankish work full of jerky dance rhythms, vintage 1920. But the String Quartet No. 2, which won the Pulitzer Prize following its premiere in 1960, is a remarkable, dense, powerful piece admitting no nonsense.

The Lenox String Quartet, which was born here several years ago, was the group playing the quartets in the evening concert. As usual, their work was dedicated, concentrated and expressive. The afternoon works were done by members of the instrumental department of the Berkshire Music Center.

Mr. Berger, who is 52 years old and composer in residence here this year, had his Woodwind Quartet in C (1949) played this afternoon. He was overheard telling a colleague that the work was from his "happy California days," and indeed the work reflected happiness in its lively, playful rhythms and clear textures.

His 1958 String Quartet of the Evening had some light moments but in general its six movements were introspective. Both works were concerted in that all the players worked toward the same ends, rather than striking to individual courses as in the Carter Pulitzer quartet.

The other afternoon pieces were one movement of the late Irving Fine's 1953 String Quartet, a passionate and very musical work; and Walter Piston's Piano Quartet.

Written this year by the 70-year old Mr. Piston, the quartet is a case of a composer who would rather fight than switch. Unlike other senior composers who have followed the serial trend—Stravinsky and Copland, for example—Mr. Piston's style has remained comfortably conservative.

●

The most recently written of all the pieces, in both instances his, was paradoxically the most out-dated.

Gunther Schuller's Quartet No. 1 (1957) and Leon Kirchner's String Quartet No. 2 (1960) completed the evening program.

Mr. Schuller, the youngest of the day's composers at 38, joined the Lenox Quartet for five curtain calls in response to the sustained applause. He is acting head of the Department of Composition, is a formidable musician and a very popular figure here.

His quartet was posed and delicate, improvisatory in feeling and quite effective as string music.

Its three movements were full of surprises and yet there was a logical feeling of growth throughout. The evaporation effect at the ending was right, too, for the ephemeral sounding work. Mr. Schuller may have been the best liked personality, but Mr. Kirchner's quartet was the best received of the four, drawing choruses of bravos. Partisan feelings run high here though, and there was at least one strong boo just to restore balance.

●

For this listener, Mr. Kirchner has supplied the meatiest and most immediately satisfying work of all. Poignance and sweetness were qualities along with serenity and a settled feeling. But there was a rhythmic urgency that gave the work a forceful dimension. It did not seem spontaneously written, but one in which logic predominated with some surprises here and there.

All of the works utilized familiar and by no means far-out materials of composing. Hearing the works together in the midst of a festival such as this made on realize just how far the younger generation has moved from these works. And the gap is widening.

New York Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384
AUG 13 1964

Tanglewood's Old Master's Night

By Eric Salzman

LENOX, Mass.

Last night was old master night at the Berkshire music center's current American music series.

Old masterpieces in this show run on to pieces like the Gunther Schuller string quartet written way back in prehistoric times like 1957, relatively recent works like the Leon Kirchner quartet of 1960 or the second string quartet of Elliot Carter and the Arthur Berger quartet of the years in between.

The occasion was a concert by the Lenox Quartet, alumni of these fair hills made good and now come back to pay their respects to their alma mater—and to some of the music which made them famous at the beginning of their career.

The Carter quartet was an especially fitting part of the program. The work was one of the ensemble's early triumphs and it stands at a kind of turning point in the development of recent American music. The influence of Carter's music, although not necessary obvious or overt, has been one of the key factors in the development of a rich new virtuoso music of great character, resource and expressive coherence and we've been hearing some of the remarkable latter-day results all this week.

The Carter is an authentic masterpiece of its kind, generating new ideas of form out of a very individual and imaginative use of the instruments and the medium. But the work should not overshadow the nearly contemporary Berger quartet which, in a very different way, achieves the same kind of poetic ends.

The Berger is built on shifting planes of texture and articulation line and attack, rhythm and tempo, motion and statis, always in and around the strong structural framework of a big expressive conception of the medium and the way it speaks. The Schuller, within a smaller formal frame, goes after many of the same ideas. It is even more explicitly built on a series of shifts from one color and texture to the next, open to semi-improvisation at one end, tightly fixed at another, pure pitch play at one moment, accent and color at another. The piece is brilliantly handled with all of Schuller's sureness of hand, medium and musical motion.

The Kirchner piece stands a little apart from the others. It is built on a Bartok-Stravinsky rhythmic sense plus a kind of linear and harmonic post-expression without benefit of clergy.

The Lenox are specialists in all this music and they play it to the manner born. Indeed, a difficult work like the Carter has become almost too easy for them and some of its essential dynamic distinctions and articulations that they used to project so well were lost in the grand motion. Aside from some such details, these were remarkably communicative performances, extraordinarily fluent and scaled to big line and shape.

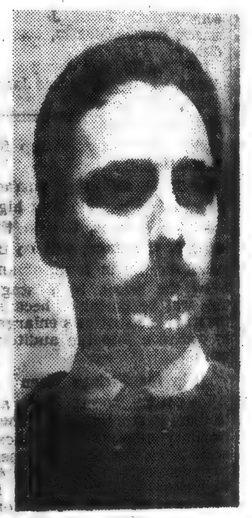
Messrs. Carter and Berger in very different phases of their creative careers were represented earlier in the day at a concert given by students of the instrumental department of the center here. These young players—by no means contemporary specialists—gave creditable performances of the Berger wind quartet of 1941, the Carter quintet of 1948—two utterly delightful more or less neoclassical works—as well as the Irving Fine string quartet of 1953 and the recent Walter Piston piano quartet. There were some problems here and there—principally in indifferentiated articulations and dynamics—but it was remarkable to hear how much the youngest generation of musicians is growing up with the Twentieth Century music as a natural means of expression for them.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785
AUG 13 1964

Music: Modern Works

Contemporary Festival at Lenox Continues

By HOWARD KLEIN
Special to The New York Times



Whitestone
Harvey Sollberger

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 12—The Festival of Contemporary American Music continued tonight with a well-attended concert in which three more of the specially commissioned Fromm Foundation pieces were given first performances. The weather has been good this week despite threats of rain and the concerts have been quite good, too, presenting stimulating new works in generally commendable performances.

A performance can be crucial to a new work and the composers here are fairly satisfied with the way their works are being done. Their scores are fiercely difficult; specialists are needed just to decipher some of the notations. Twenty-two works are being done in all by the nucleus of 18 instrumentalists holding Fromm Fellowships, and they are bearing up well under their Herculean task of learning all this music.

At least two players in particular stand out as deserving special mention: Paul Zukofsky, violinist, and John Bergamo, percussionist. They must rehearse and play about 14 hours a day but their playing shows no fatigue.

●

They are the kind of players composers dream of, for they seem to master the new techniques almost before they are invented.

Another who fits this category is 26-year-old flutist-composer Harvey Sollberger. He opened the program with a noble and poetic reading of Mario Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 1 for flute and tape recorder. His playing of the brilliant flute part, which is framed by more brilliant electronic sounds, was dazzling.

Mr. Sollberger closed the program as composer with his commissioned work, Chamber Variations for 12 Players and Conductor, who was in this case Gunther Schuller.

A forbiddingly difficult work of some 12 minutes it fell apart about a third of the way through. Mr. Schuller stopped, began again at the beginning and then completed it.

Heard this way undoubtedly gave a false impression of the work, which had many striking features. Scored for strings, winds and percussion, its bits and fragments flowed together producing a sort of eccentric momentum. And there were arresting sounds from the instruments. It was obviously a well-constructed piece all of whose merits were not shown at this hearing.

It had the added attraction, of distraction, of a bat that flew in circles beneath the slanting shed roof of the Theater-Concert hall.

●

David Del Tredici made his debut as a conductor leading the first performance of his "I Hear an Army," for soprano and string quartet. Mr. Tredici, who is 27 years old, has set James Joyce's text in a lyrical and poetic fashion. The solo was punctuated and followed by long interesting quartet passages.

Phyllis Brynjulson, a pretty young singer with perfect pitch and rhythm, delivered the lines in an accurate but somewhat cool manner that may have damped some of the work's fervor, but it was a pleasing performance of a pleasing work.

Randolph Coleman's Concerto for Piano and Chamber Orchestra in its first performance was a strong work in seven short sections. Lawrence Smith, the pianist, learned the difficult work in four days when the original pianist became unavailable.

Mr. Coleman, who also is 27, used the piano traditionally and at times had Mr. Smith lean forward to play on the strings with fingers or a metal triangle-beater.

●

The piece grew in interest and intensity from the quiet opening reaching strong climaxes toward the middle. Eduardo Mata conducted precisely and commandingly.

Donald Martino's trio for flute, clarinet and piano and Loren Rush's "Mandala Music —Improvisations for Three or More Performers" completed the list.

Mr. Martino's trio was classic in its purity and concision and also its restricted dynamic range. It was a relief from the gesturing that marks many of the works.

Mr. Rush's "Mandala," (an Italian word for almond) used five players. The audience got the giggles when Mr. Zukofsky punctuated a violin phrase with a boom from a base drum, which he played by means of a pedal. After that any loud sound sent the listeners off again. The players were in earnest though.

It is the kind of piece that receives a first performance every time it is played since the players agree on what order they want to play the available groups of improvisatory material differently each time it's played. This time around it sounded fine.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP AGENCY
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4300
BOSTON, MASS.
Evening Globe
Eve. Circ. 144,
AUG 13 1964

Contemporar

'I Hear
Very E

By MICHAEL STEIN
Globe Music Cr

LENOX — On We evening at Tangle more compositions played as part of the Festival of Conte
American music.

Three of them we cially commissioned Coleman's Concerto
and Chamber Orchest
ting of Joyce's "I Army" by David Del and Harvey So Chamber Variation
Twelve Players and
tor. The other tha
"Older" pieces by c who have been wi resented by com
Mario Davidovsky's
isms No. 1" for flute
David Donald Mart for Violin, Clarinet, a and the "Mandala M
Loren Rush.

Coleman, whose w played with dazzlin
by Lawrence Smith
ducted by Eduardo sound effect man tricks. The piano st plucked, beaten, and with various objects ware, as well as str normal manner. The stantial improvisato which in this pe emerged rather out
The work is of tial triviality. Retur performance, the F lows seem to be forge to get unisons and tune.

Del Tredici's "I Army" I admire not its courage. Its lan quite different from heard so far in this highly intense, non-most tonal chromatic effectively handled.
effective contrast be tightly curled ultra repetitions of the str tet as against the swinging vocal line is very effective. Th conducted the per how long will we

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Evening Globe
Circ. 144,855
AUG 13 1964

Contemporary Music at Lenox

'I Hear an Army' Very Effective Work

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

LENOX — On Wednesday evening at Tanglewood, six more compositions were played as part of the current Festival of Contemporary American music.

Three of them were especially commissioned: Randolph Coleman's Concerto for Piano and Chamber Orchestra, a setting of Joyce's "I Hear An Army" by David Del Tredici, and Harvey Sollberger's Chamber Variations for Twelve Players and Conductor. The other three were "Older" pieces by composers who have been, or will be, represented by commissions: Mario Davidovsky's "Synchonisms No. 1" for flute and tape; David Donald Martino's Trio for Violin, Clarinet, and Piano; and the "Mandala Music" of Loren Rush.

Coleman, whose work was played with dazzling aplomb by Lawrence Smith and conducted by Eduardo Mata, is a sound effect man. He uses tricks. The piano strings are plucked, beaten, and bomber with various objects of hardware, as well as struck in the normal manner. There is a substantial improvisatory passage, which in this performance emerged rather out of style. The work is of inconsequential triviality. Returning to the performance, the Fromm Fellows seem to be forgetting how to get unisons and triads in tune.

Del Tredici's "I Hear An Army" I admire not least for its courage. Its language is quite different from any other heard so far in this festival, a highly intense, non-serial, almost tonal chromaticism, most effectively handled. There is effective contrast between the tightly curled uttrances and repetitions of the strong quartet as against the broadly swinging vocal line. The work is very effective. The composer conducted the performance—how long will we need conductors for five players?—And the vocal part was superbly by a marvelous young soprano, Phyllis Brynjulson.

The sollberger variations are enormously ambitious, somehow dense and spacious at the same time in their texture.

Davidovskys "Synchronisms No. 1" played brilliantly by Harvey Sollberger, is an attractive and elegant little number. It is less ambitious than the similar work played here a few days ago and which combines four instruments with tape, but it is morecompletely achieved.

The Martino trio, serial, tightly integrated, intelligent, and with fine sense for the sound that instruments make, was one of the most estimable things heard here, though it impressed the audience rather less than some of the sillier pieces. It was played by Carol Rand, piano, Paul Zukofsky, violin and Edward Avedisian, clarinet.

Loren Rush's "Mandala Music" is described as "improvisations for three or more performers." There were five in this version. The composer provides pitches, but a fair choice of orders in which to play hem, no dynamics, note lengths or even specifications of instruments. It's a whole lot easier than composing.

Wuorinen's concerto, played by the incomparable Sollberger and very well conducted by Melvin Strauss, is coarser stuff and cut to larger dimensions. It starts with the great textural density and rhetorical violence that has in general been characteristic of Wuorinen's work, and proceeds from there to ever more transparent and spare sounds. Parallel, casual and resultant from all this, is the increasing emergence of the solo instrument.

In Rush's "Nexus 16," the conductor imitates the hands of a clock. He has, in fact, a stop watch on the stand before him. The music, as written out, is divided into quarter-minute segments into which the players, a heterogeneous ensemble of 16, must fit little pasms of music, beginning and ending at times only approximately indicated within the 15-second units, and subject to some free variation on the part of the performer.

The program also included the noisy bustle of William Sydeman's Quartet for flute, violin, clarinet and piano. John MacIvor Perkins' Caprice, very wel played on the piano by Easley Blackwood, is perhaps capricious in mood, but wholly sober in design, a well made piece of work.

Also there was a grand quartet for flutes by Sollberger. The old joke runs, "What's worse than a flute?" With the answer, "Four of them." It was an astounding demonstration of things the flute has learned to do. That includes many things many flutists have not yet learned to do.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Union
Morn. Circ. 83,193
AUG 14 1964

Contemporary American Music Festival Ends

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—The final concert of the five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music Thursday night at Tanglewood presented the last three of 12 musical works given world premiere performances here.

Ten Pieces Commissioned

Nine of the 12 were commissioned by Fromm Foundation, sponsor of the festival with the Berkshire Music Center, and one by the Weschler Commission.

The other two were choral works written by Daniel Pinkham of Boston and Stanley Silverman of Buffalo.

The final three works were a concerto for piano and chamber orchestra by Robert Newell of Urbana, Ill., "Concerto for Wind Quintet" by Donald Martino of New Haven and a piece by John MacIvor Perkins called "Music for Thirteen Players."

Newell's concerto used an orchestra of 15 players with the pianist, David del Tredici. It starts with a fairly long solo piano introduction which leads into a mixed-up collection of contributions from the orchestra.

Unusual Conductor Role

Very gradually it becomes less and less disorganized. Occasionally passages show through that have a semblance of the traditional.

There are chords that sound chromatic rather than chaotic, and there are passages that seem to stay in key.

Martino's "Concerto for Wind Quintet" was presented with a conductor (Gunther Schuller), which is unusual for a quintet, but in this case apparently necessary.

Rehearsal time was limited, and the piece was another example of thorough fragmentation and constantly changing rhythms, meters and speeds.

One slight variation was the long-line solo passages, especially for the flute and French horn. They were pleasing.

Pointillism Technique Used

Perkins "Music for Thirteen Players" was last on the program. It too, like other contemporary music, was a mystifying collection of little notes, bits and pieces contributed by all members of the orchestra in very rapid succession, sometimes overlapping and bunching up.

The technique is often called pointillism. It makes extensive use of quiet percussion. Those familiar with the painting method of the same name can guess what the music is like.

This piece was mostly gentle and delicate, like a Chinese glass chandelier.

Three other works on the program were by Randolph Coleman, Charles Wuorinen and David del Tredici, whose new works commissioned for the festival had been played on earlier programs.

(Each of the 10 commissioned composers contributed two works to the program, one in addition to the commissioned piece.)

Players Need Aid

Coleman's piece, called "Projection No. 3" for flute, oboe and clarinet, required such concentrated attention by the players that each needed a helper to turn the pages of the score, a rare sight.

The music offered an interesting use of the similar treble timbres of the instruments, each seeming to be pursuing totally independent courses.

After six or eight minutes the music paused while the page turners shuffled the pages of the score into a different sequence. Then the music started again.

Wuorinen and del Tredici played some of their own solo piano music, both seeming to show as much professional knowledge of the piano as of their music.

Music Is Shattering

Wuorinen's "Piano Variations" started with lumps and lightning. Soon the lumps became dynamite and lightning a searing brilliance. There was a deathly silence with just enough sound to accent the silence, then the explosions returned.

It was shattering music.

Del Tredici's "Fantasy Pieces for Piano" were densely chromatic and contained virtually the only moments during the festival that might be called lovely.

There were moments of emotional power, also, easily felt by a listener oriented to traditional harmony and del Tredici's performance appeared to be flawless.

All things considered, the Thursday night program seems the most satisfying of the festival.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 603,574
AUG 15 1964

159

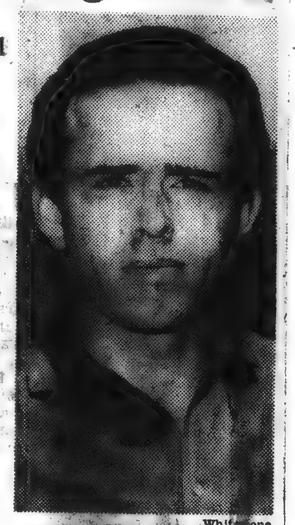
Music: At Tanglewood

Contemporary Festival Ends 5-Day Run

By HOWARD KLEIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 13—As the final concert of the five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music here at Tanglewood started Thursday night, everyone agreed it had been a grueling two weeks for all concerned—the 10 composers, the 18 Fromm Fellowship instrumentalists and the four conductors.

But there was pride in the accomplishment and a feeling that the undertaking was completely justified, for the grouping of the concerts in one week focused greater attention on the young composers and their works.



Whitestone
David Del Tredici

Paul Fromm, founder and president of the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, which sponsored the event with the Berkshire Music Center, seemed to have no misgivings, for he was smiling all over the grounds.

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, thanked him at the intermission, comparing the festival to a helicopter flight over the map of today's music.

Three Fromm commissions were heard, but the strongest impressions were made by two composers playing older works. These were the performances by Charles Wuorinen of his Piano Variations and by David Del Tredici of his Fantasy Pieces for Piano.

Both men are virtuoso pianists and inspired performers. It was perhaps the high level of performing that made their contributions stand out. The other works seemed to be afflicted by problems that made their performances less than lively.

Robert Newell's Concerto for Piano and Chamber Orchestra was a promising work that developed some unfortunate stylistic lapses. After being consistently fragmented and nonmelodic, the 22-minute work suddenly went into a long theme in octaves.

Melvin Strauss conducted this suavely, if perhaps a little too slowly. But nothing would really have helped that ending except a rewriting. Mr. Del Tredici was the pianist.

Donald Martino, a 33-year-old teacher at Yale University, was the composer of a 20-minute Concerto for Wind Quintet, which was conducted by Gunther Schuller. Traditional sounds were combined with buzzings and offbeat tones of a sort a teacher would discourage in a beginner.

But this is the language of the new music, and Mr. Martino used the sounds effectively in cadenzas for each instrument. The complex work seemed to have more substance than was made plain at this hearing.

John MacIvor Perkins, a 29-year-old composer who teaches at the University of Chicago, provided Music for 13 Players, which was led by Michel Plasson. This lasted about eight minutes and varied from jumbles of sound from all the players to thinned-out passages of pointillistic character. A lack of forward thrust made this relatively short work seem longer than it was.

The opening work was Randolph Coleman's Projection No. 3 for Flute, Oboe and Clarinet. Three page turns were needed, not only to flip the pages but also, after the trio had read the work once, to shuffle the pages so that it could be run again with the segments in different order.

Two of 36 possible combinations were played. They might have been more successful had the players articulated and phrased their music with more definition and clarity.

It may be that a bona fide masterwork has emerged from the commissioned pieces. Opinions on their worth and their composers varied sharply, as one might expect. Whether masterworks are produced is not essential though, for the idea of the festival was to focus attention on the 10 composers, and this has been done.

And there was value in this exposure not only of their music to the audiences but equally of themselves to one other.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

AUG 14 1964

Music Review

Contemporary Festival Finale

By ANDREW CLARKE

RIGHT AFTER intermission at the final concert of the contemporary music festival at Tanglewood last night, Erich Leinsdorf walked out on stage and explained why the festival had taken place. He likened the five days of concerts to an airplane ride during which one can observe a much greater area of landscape than would be possible on the ground. In a similar fashion, he felt, the festival had enabled audiences to get a broader picture of what this new music phenomenon is all about.

He added that the Fromm student players deserved high praise for their devotion to and skill in performing what he called "not altogether simple music," perhaps the understatement of the year.

* * *

THIS LAST concert was well-programmed for it contained a wide variety of new-music expression. Randolph Coleman's "Projection No. 3, for Flute, Oboe and Clarinet" opened the program. It had been explained that we would hear only two of a possible 36 variations of this piece, which consists of five sections played without a pause. The variations result from a rearrangement of these sections. The work was notable for an imaginative treatment of woodwind capabilities, and it retained its interest despite the limited medium of only three instruments.

Robert Newell's "Concerto for Piano and Chamber Orchestra" which followed was the first of three pieces on the program in which the piano was the solo instrument. Soloist David del Tredici was competent as he demonstrated a fine technique in this difficult piece. There was a sensitive balance between the piano and the orchestra, which never allowed the former to be overshadowed by the latter. A few bloopers by some of the brass players and the clarinet were the only things that marred the performance.

* * *

CHARLES Wuorinen's "Piano Variations," which the composer performed himself, was a hair raising experience. It sounded like a fiendishly difficult piece to play, and for that reason will probably never become a staple in any pianist's repertoire. However, its tempestousness explored the full range of the piano's tonal and dynamic range, particularly its extremities. Mr. Wuormen was very impressive in his apparent mastery of the material.

After intermission, David del Tredici performed his own "Fantasy Pieces for Piano," which was far and away the most tradition-inspired composition of the evening. There were many instances of tonality, and I thought that it successfully combined old and new techniques, although a purist might not have been impressed. In any event, the composer was not concerned with being as bizarre as possible.

* * *

I TOOK considerable pride in Donald Martino's "Concerto for Wind Quintet," because (and I can't resist relating this) I once studied music theory with the composer. But even if I were unbiased, I would have to say that Mr. Martino's composition struck me as the most mature work I heard during the festival. It was a well-proportioned piece, with contrasting solo and ensemble sections. The composer plays the clarinet and it is obvious that he understands woodwinds. The separate lines in the ensemble portions were easy to follow, and he knows which instruments sound well together in the right registers. The warm applause he received was well deserved.

* * *

THE FINAL piece of the concert and of the festival was John MacIvor Perkins' "Music for Thirteen Players," and I thought it an unfortunate selection with which to leave people with a lasting impression. I could find no discernible framework in the composition, and the total effect was, at times, nothing short of cacophony. Being completely new and different is fine as far as it goes, but I don't understand a total abandonment of order. I would hope that contemporary music will not follow such lines.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Sunday Globe
Sun. Circ. 488,105

AUG 16 1964

Festival Within Festival

Contemporary American Music at Tanglewood

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

LENOX—This is a report on the Contemporary American Music Festival now in progress at Tanglewood supplementary to the stories that have appeared in the Daily Globe during the past week. At the time of writing, Wednesday evening, there have been two panel discussions, presided over most admirably by Aaron Copland, in which the 10 young composers here, along with Lukas Foss, Leon Kirchner, Arthur Berger, Gunther Schuller, and Allen Sapp, have discussed in effect the education of composers and the education of audiences. These I hope to write about later.

STEINBERG

At the opening concert last Sunday evening, Aaron Copland made a brief speech of welcome and also introduced Paul Fromm, but for whom...

On that concert three works newly commissioned for the festival by the Fromm Foundation were introduced, "Nexus 16" by Loren Rush; Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No. 2" for flute, clarinet, violin, cello and tape; and Charles Wuorinen's Chamber Concerto for flute and 10 players.

Both Davidovsky's work and Wuorinen's were quite impressive. Davidovsky's piece on a small scale is concerned with bridging the gap between conventional and electronic media. He does so by juxtaposition more than by simultaneity. In other words, he does not wholly confront the problem, but within the limits set by its rather modest ambitions, "Synchronisms No. 2" is a piece of the most fastidious facture, and it provides renewed evidence of Davidovsky's unusually sensitive ear for timbres.

Wuorinen's concerto, played by the incomparable Harvey Sollberger and very well conducted by Melvin Strauss, is coarser stuff and cut to larger dimensions. It starts with the great textural density and rhetorical violence that has in general been characteristic of Wuorinen's work, and proceeds from there to ever more transparent and spare sounds. Parallel, causal and resultant from all this is the increasing emergence of the solo instrument.

The concerto is, among other things, an extraordinary virtuoso vehicle for the newly extended flute technique. The flute, however, in the fascinating exploitations of different kinds of tone and attack appears not merely as a kind of Thesaurus of amazing things Mr. Sollberger can do, but they are an organic feature of the composition. Uneconomical perhaps in some respects, but a strong and gripping music.

More Flutes

In Rush's "Nexus 16," the conductor imitates the hands of a clock. He has, in fact, a stop watch on the stand before him. The music as written out is divided into quarter-minute segments into which the players, a heterogeneous ensemble of 16, must fit little spasms of music, beginning and ending at times only approximately indicated within the 15 second units, and subject to some free variation on the part of the performer.

The work is tediously pretty, and it sounds distinctly French — the introduction to Debussy's "Jeux" or thereabouts. The boredom the music generated was not helped by having before one the human clock, Eduardo Mata, that so explicitly spelled out the slow passing of the minutes.

The program also included the noisy bustle of William Sydeman's quartet for flute, violin, clarinet, and piano. John MacIvor Perkins' Caprice, very well played on the piano by Easley Blackwood, is perhaps capricious in mood, but wholly sober in design, a well made piece of work.

Also there was a Grand Quartet for flutes by Harvey Sollberger. The old joke runs, "What's worse than a flute?" The answer, "Four of them." It was an astounding demonstration of things the flute has learned to do. That includes many things many flutists have not yet learned to do. And I found the absence from the concert of Boston Symphony flutists neither encouraging nor surprising. As music, Sollberger's quartet is quite empty headed except for a few ideas borrowed from Elliot Carter. I found its quadruple shrillings and clackings a most unpleasant nerve stimulus, physically painful even, though the racket was produced most expertly by Harvey and Sophie Sollberger, Elinor Preble, and David Shostac.

Further to the Tuesday night concert by the Lenox String Quartet at which works by Arthur Berger, Elliot Carter, Leon Kirchner, and Gunther Schuller were played. The mastery of Carter's Second Quartet is now an established fact, and I look forward to the time that Berger's will be recognized as being one of the best things to have happened in American music in the past decade.

Schuller's Reminiscences of Berg and Bartok seem calculated primarily from the point of view of what will be effective for the performers to do, all but regardless sometimes of compositional consistency.

Kirchner's work, with its expansive emotional gestures, seemed in the context of this concert to be from a different world altogether. Its harmonies suggest Tristan as viewed from 1964, of course, and its string writing, Bruch. It is intense, passionately convinced of its expressive purpose, and to me in that sense wholly convincing.

After the highly calculated pieces of Carter and Berger it sounded almost reckless in certain respects, but it was no displeasure to return for 20 minutes to that old time legato tradition.

The Lenox Quartet, whose members are Peter Marsh, Theodora Mantz, Paul Hersh, and Donald McCall, grew out of the appointment some years back of three of its present members as Fromm fellows at Tanglewood. It has to a certain extent specialized in contemporary music, and it plays the modern literature with enthusiasm and with careful preparation. Still, the intonation is not always exactly where it should be, and in the one piece on the program I noticed that the performance seemed less good than formerly. Dynamics and bowings have become streamlined, flattened out, and the effect seemed this time a little casual.

Tanglewood: The Wrapup Six

By Eric Salzman

LENOX, Mass.

Another set of six wrapped up a crammed Tanglewood week of contemporary music Thursday night; three brand new pieces commissioned by the Fromm Foundation and another three hardly much drier on the page.

Donald Martino's wind quintet was probably the easiest nut to crack and the hardest to chew; that is, it is a complex twelve-tone piece of great intellectual integrity and honesty and is also long and demanding on everybody.

The piece works partly because, like his trio heard earlier, there is real elegance and finesse to the conception and partly because—and this is a step beyond the rather abstract trio—it grows out of the nature of the ensemble and the character of the instruments. Martino is the only young composer here who is continuing to pursue the ideals of our complex and rich twelve-tone music, and if he can square it with a real performance conception and a communication in meaningful psychological time—as he begins to do here—he will have accomplished something quite extraordinary.

John MacIvor Perkins' Music For Thirteen Players is, on the other hand, one of those constructed pieces laid out in such flat obvious planes that it sounds almost like a diagram for a piece—it twitches, it percusses, it post-Webernizes and then back again. Some of it is not without interest but (if the word in any of its senses applies to a piece in strict three-quarter time) the conception is strictly square.

The third new piece, a piano concerto by Robert Newell has a kind of Schoenberg-out-of-Kirchner piano part which is not badly written. The orchestral parts, however, are hopeless; The composer simply does not know how to handle instruments and ensembles.

Two of the other compositions were big, impressive piano pieces, including a fat, virtuoso set of wild Charles Wuorinen piano variations, jammed full of notes and spaces, big gestures and deep breaths. The notes don't matter much at all, only the contours and textures, but the piece has real shape and power none the less.

David Del Tredici's fantasy pieces for piano constitute a kind of homage to Schumann, shaped in an oddly original and touching way. Del Tredici's commitment to a certain kind of expressive sound and intense, almost neo-tonal technique of repetition makes his music unique among that of the young composers here.

Randolph Coleman's Projection No. 3 for flute, oboe and clarinet is one of those shuffle-the-cards pieces in which six different segments —three of which are the other three backwards—can be read off in thirty-six different ways. Two of the possibilities were performed; one way is probably as good as the next. From a certain point of view the detailed writing is perfectly competent, but the weakness of the over-all conception and the insistent overriden wind scoring do not help matters much.

The fact that this festival was possible at all was due to the remarkable efforts of a few people working with Gunther Schuller and, of course, to the performers, the nucleus of which were the Fromm Fellowship players—Melvin Strauss, conductor; Sophie Sollberger, flute; Paul Zukossay, violin; John Bergamo, percussion, and Mr. Del Tredici, piano were some of the most outstanding. To ignore the performance problems of the week would be impossible, but not to credit the extraordinary work accomplished in an incredibly short time would be a mistake.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2073, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Evening Globe
Eve. Circ. 144,355

AUG 14 1964

Contemporary Music Fete

Last Special Program Stirs the Audience

By MICHAEL STEINBERG Globe Music Critic

LENOX — The Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary American Music ended on Thursday evening. Six pieces were played, three of them newly commissioned by the Fromm Foundation: Robert Newell's Concerto for Piano and Chamber Orchestra, Donald Martino's Concerto for Wind Quintet, John MacIver Perkins' Music for 13 Players. Three of the other composers who were here for the festival were represented by earlier pieces: Randolph Coleman by "Projection No. 3" for flute, oboe and clarinet, Charles Wuorinen by his Piano Variations, and David del Tredici by his Fantasy Pieces for piano.

The Newell concerto, played by David del Tredici and conducted by Melvin Strauss, is a chromatic, inconsistent, badly-scored mess. Neither it, nor the previously heard "Trojan Women," suggests that Newell is a composer.

The Martino wind piece is a vast complexity from every point of view. Its sounds are completely dissimilar from those of every other wind quintet I know. That I'm inclined to regard as a virtue. Its alternations of solos and ensembles are admirably organic. More than that I cannot say at this point, particularly since the performance in some respects obscured almost as much as it revealed.

The Perkins Music for 13 Players is in the pretty tradition. It uses a colorful and diverse ensemble to make nervous twittering sounds at a rapid tempo. Its middle section, where the events are widely spaced and the textures more spare, is a piece of rather thin Babbittry. Once again, and regrettably, the performance was inadequate.

Coleman's "Projection No. 3" consists of five sections which can be played in 36 different orders. Mercy dictated the limiting of this happening to just two of them. The compositional material is very simple, almost painfully easy to recognize on the second trip through and the results were deadly both ways.

Charles Wuorinen looks cold, angry, slightly contemptuous, when he comes on stage, and he often composes music to match. The gestures of his Piano Variations are those of extreme fury: every aggressive device imaginable occurs. Yet both as composer and as pianist, Wourinen radiates an uncommon dramatic force, and the Variations in his own performance made one of the more meaningful moments of the festival.

David del Tredici writes music that is neither stuck in the 19th century nor fashionably modern. His Fantasy Pieces use Shoenberg's earlier piano pieces for their model, not the worst of ideas since they provide a model both beautiful and to a certain extent imitable. The music almost suggested what might have happened had Liszt lived to make a virtuoso transcription of "Transfigured Night." The composer's own performance was very beautiful.

The audience here finally began to react with other than routine politeness. At this concert it seemed that the Moderns sat near the front and the Ancients near the back, and there was booing for Wuorinen and Martino from the back (and cheers from the front), and del Tredici produced just the reverse reaction.

Erich Leinsdorf spoke briefly after the intermission in order to thank Paul Fromm "for a six-course festival."

Buffalo Evening News
D. 283,236 SUN. 296,860

AUG 25 1964

Foss Puts Focus On Buffalo Music In Berkshire Panel

By JUDITH GERSTEL
Special to Buffalo Evening News

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., Aug. 25—Listening to the new sounds and hints of the future in the Berkshire Festival of Contemporary Music, just completed, is much like venturing into the new science fiction—one finds it both fascinating and frightening.

Some of the works seemed to leap off into new orbits in tonal space, with the same effect of exploring new directions one felt in the Buffalo Philharmonic premiere of the Stockhausen "Menmente" the past season.

Buffalo, in fact, frequently has been in the spotlight this summer in Tanglewood, where Buffalo conductor-composer Lukas Foss has taken a leading role in festival panels and other activities.

Mr. Foss and Allen D. Sapp, Music Department chairman of State University of Buffalo, joined in musical discussions.

Half With Him

Conductor Foss told the audience and his panel colleagues, including composers Aaron Copeland and Leon Kirchner, that he felt he had half of Buffalo with him and half against him in what he was trying to do with the orchestra.

Mr. Foss said that the symphony orchestra, as a principal musical voice in the nation, soon would become a museum piece if it were necessary to cling to the traditional European set-up and organization.

The Buffalo maestro said it must be revamped if it is to continue to function, and suggested that one must now think of the orchestra as a "big, elastic pool" from which various instrumental combinations can be drawn, for the ever-wider variety of works available.

Area Violinists Present

Mr. Foss felt this "kaleidescope" concept of the orchestra would be ideal for performing not only contemporary music, but also those Renaissance and later works written for unusual combinations.

Adding to the Buffalo emphasis, two area scholarship violinists, Claudia Rantucci and Alan Gerstel, and a Fromm Foundation Players member, bassoonist David Carroll of Buffalo, have been active in the Berkshire Music Center.

Some of these Fromm musicians also have been selected as "creative associates" in the new $200,000 Rockefeller Foundation music project this fall at the State University of Buffalo.

Among these will be guitarist-composer Stanley Silverman, whose "Canso" for chorus and "plucked-string consort" was premiered among works commissioned expressly for this festival.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2073, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Sunday Globe
Sun. Circ. 488,105

AUG 23 1964

Tanglewood

An Attempt to Appraise Modern Music Festival

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

STEINBERG

One of my colleagues covering the recent Festival of Contemporary American Music at Tanglewood was last seen struggling with a Sunday piece called something "Whither American Music?" I should not like to speculate on the basis of what the festival offered.

It gave one plenty to think about. Within a period of less than 100 hours there were six concerts that included 13 premieres, and the rest of what was played included six pieces new to me.

The Fromm Foundation had commissioned works from Randolph Coleman, Mario Davidovsky, David del Tredici, Donald Martino, Robert Newell, John MacIvor Perkins, Loren Rush, Harvey Sollberger and Charles Wuorinen; there were Wechsler commissions for Newell and for William Sydeman; and there were free premieres, so to speak, of pieces by Daniel Pinkham and Stanley Silverman. Except for the last two, every composer was represented by two pieces, Sydeman by three if you count the piece that the Boston Symphony played on the weekend following the festival. Tuesday was old masters' day, when Arthur Berger and Elliott Carter each had two pieces played, and there was one each by Irving Fine, Leon Kirchner, Walter Piston and Gunther Schuller.

What Price "Festival?"

It was an impressive achievement, and it left us all about half dead. The performers were unimaginably limp, glazed, exhausted when it was all done. I understand the publicity value of having all the concerts close together so that it could be called a Festival—a very "in" word these days—and it made possible, or at least more probable, the complete press coverage that the event received from the two big New York dailies.

Still, I wonder if the intensity of the experience and the attendant fatigue was not self-defeating. I am sure the performances suffered. One would hope that the support of the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Foundation would create conditions under which really representative performances could be prepared. Yet it was not always so.

Some of the works were very well done indeed, but others came out quite badly. Included in the latter category, unfortunately, were what seemed to be the two most interesting of the Fromm Commissions: Donald Martino's Concerto for Wind Quintet and Harvey Sollberger's Chamber Variations for Twelve Players and Conductor.

Both works are of extreme difficulty, especially Martino's and in both instances Gunther Schuller achieved miracles given the circumstances. The trouble was that some of the Fromm Fellowship Players were incompetent to a disturbing degree. Also there were administrative problems: there were far too many stories of schedule conflicts, quintet rehearsals with only two players available, valuable time wasted because the harp or percussion instruments had not been brought to the right building at the proper time, or hours wasted under a conductor completely unable to handle the problems of a piece and who finally had to be removed from his assignment.

Double Perspective

The double representation of each composer was a good idea: it was interesting to observe how impressions complemented each other or supported each other, and it was fascinating to note the progress some of the composers had made between their earlier and their most recent work.

Del Tredici's music and Wuorinen's were both indicative of strong personalities, perhaps at this point more latent than actual in the case of del Tredici. Davidovsky's links of synthesized with "normal" sounds were very finely made, and the music of Perkins was in a more academic way solidly made. Sollberger's Chamber Variations seemed in a way the most promising new piece of the two pieces by Donald Martino.

There were moments [illegible] seemed the most completely achieved.

Pinkham's Stabat Mater was the most conventional music heard and in some respects the least fresh. Yet I learned from it something of the value of maturity and experience. Pinkham goes about his task with an assurance that was doubly welcome in the face of the complete intellectual and artistic confusion that beset the pieces by Coleman and Newell. Neither of these composers showed any ability to compose, that is, to make a succession of musical events cohere. However, much promise they show to those who chose them for commissions, and who presumably know their music better than I do, neither is at this point ready to assume the repsonsibility that goes with a major commission.

The passion for youth for its own sake is a dangerous thing, and one thinks of many composers approaching the middle generation, people in their early 30's, still not wholly established, who badly need the support the Fromm Foundation could give them and who could have used it more capably and responsibly, the festival when all of us got discouraged, especially by the mannered and tricky nature of so many of the compositions. But it all served as a vivid reminder that composers and compositions are the essence of musical life, and it was exciting to live for some days in an atmosphere in which such concerns were made so vividly manifest.

I was greatly impressed by the contrast the day after the festival within the festival was over. There was a Boston Symphony concert that night—a deplorably undistinguished one conducted by Max Rudolf—and it was quite a shock suddenly to be plunged back into that make-believe musical world where tyrants wave wands over bored musicians carelessly making disagreeable noises in the name of poor Beethoven, and where all this is offered as an event of cultural significance.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,191
AUG 18 1964

Music Review

Tanglewood-Marlboro-Bennington Triangle Shares Common Musical Link

By LISA TATE

NORTH BENNINGTON — Way back in July, a full-page article in the Herald Tribune's Sunday Magazine section traced a musical triangle with Tanglewood, Marlboro and Bennington as its three points. I have been on this triangle (or in it) this past week, finding what links and what separates its three musical angles.

Granted some esthetic differences in their approaches to music, these three centers, nevertheless, have much in common, even to the sharing of composers and musicians. And last week found all three concentrating some attention, if not all attention, on contemporary music.

Tanglewood devoted a full four days to a Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Fromm Foundation. There were performances each evening of commissioned works by 10 young composers in residence. "Older" contemporary composers were also very much present, discussing the problems of composition, performance and the teaching of contemporary music together.

The Lenox Quartet presented four contemporary quartets in their program at Tanglewood on Tuesday evening, with three of the four composers present (Arthur Berger, Gunther Schuller and Leon Kirchner). Elliott Carter could not be there to take his bows, though his Second String Quartet was far and away the most radical piece of music on the program and the most provocative.

Leon Kirchner's Second String Quartet (written in 1958) drew the most enthusiastic response from the audience, and understandably so, for its use of the contemporary idiom has a sense of sequence and of feeling that allow for profound musical enjoyment in addition to the stimulation provided by its extreme dissonances. Its construction is close-knit and within the grasp of the traditionally - oriented ear.

The same quartet was performed again Saturday night at Marlboro, this time by a quartet which included Felix Galimir and Jaime Laredo, violins, Samuel Rhodes, viola and Mischa Schneider (of the Budapest Quartet), cello. They played it more warmly, if with a little less smoothness. Some of the same lyric quality was audible in Kirchner's Sonata concertate (1952) performed on Friday night by Arnold Steinhardt on the violin, with the composer himself at the piano. And Kirchner — who has been a composer in residence at Marlboro this past week — conducted a rousing rendition of Beethoven's Choral Fantasy Sunday, with Rudolph Serkin as piano soloist, the piece that traditionally brings the Marlboro Music Festival to the end of its summer season.

But before ending, the Marlboro musicians devoted other attentions to other modern music, performing with breathtaking care and good consequence the "Konzert" op. 24 of Anton Webern, composed in 1934, and Georges Enesco's Dixtuor in D Major for 10 wind instruments, conducted and coached with the unique dedication of Marcel Moyse.

The rest of the Marlboro weekend was rich in Beethoven serenades, and quintets and sextets of Brahms and Dvorak. Highlight of the romantic music, however, was Friday night's performance of Schubert's "Trout" quintet, with Rudolf Serkin at the piano. The other musicians included Shmuel Ashkenaski, whose touch on the violin is nothing short of exquisite, Samuel Rhodes, viola, Herman Busch, cello, and Julius Levine, bass — each of whom played with a spirit and a feeling that perfectly matched the eloquence of the piano part, for a totally refreshing result.

To revert to contemporary music, which will hold sway at Bennington for the next two weeks, as the Composers Conference gets under way there, a foretaste was readily available at Tanglewood last week, though I got only one small taste of a quite extensive offering.

Charles Wuorinen, who is now here, performed his own Piano Variations on that most versatile of instruments Thursday night. He played his piece impressively, with many percussive effects, but little variation in dynamics. Most intriguing is the way in which he has built the overtones of the piano right into the fabric of his composition. More romantic and gentle was another piano composition played by another young composer, David Del Tredici, who likewise is the undoubted master of his instrument.

The Composers Conference presented its introductory concert at the college's Carriage Barn Sunday night, and Harvey Sollberger, whose works were also performed at Tanglewood last week, opened it with a very vital performance of Mario Davidowsky's Synchronisms for Flute and Tape Recorder. His playing had a plasticity that contrasted effectively with the arbitrary but interesting electronic sounds that emerged from the speakers to either side of him.

The Composers Conference will present its next concert on Wednesday night, and every Saturday and Wednesday thereafter through Aug. 29. Marlboro has finished for this summer, and Tanglewood comes to a close next weekend. It may look like a triangle geographically, but each of these musical endeavors is built around a single common concern, the perpetuation of the composer's creativity by the re-creation of his works in performance, be he contemporary or not.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Sunday Republican
Sun. Circ. 114,397
AUG 23 1964

Festival of Contemporary Music Poses, Answers Several Questions

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—In some ways it is too late as well as too early to speculate about Tanglewood's first Festival of Contemporary Music.

There were a few words of commentary in this space last week, but they were as nothing compared to the thousands of words already said in musical circles and being written for consumption in musical journals.

One sad thing about the festival is that such a stir should be raised by the seemingly simple and candid process of writing, performing and hearing today's music today.

Century Ago

Such a process was taken for granted for hundreds of years. Until about 100 years ago it was difficult to find anyone to perform old music.

Now it is necessary to go out of our way to schedule a special event for new music—to hire 10 composers and 13 performers to prepare new music specially for a festival. There is an unsettling truth in the contention that there is virtually no other way to hear it.

The situation is doubly odd in view of the value placed on the newness of material things (last year's model is no good) and the success of new popular music.

Why is this? What has happened to reverse the position of new serious music?

Several Answers

Well, many experts have offered several dozen answers to these questions without impressing the composers, and last week at three afternoon panel discussions during the festival the 10 composers whose new works were performed at the festival and five senior members of the contemporary composing fraternity not only tried to answer some questions but also raised some questions on their own.

The composers were Aaron Copland, Lukas Foss, Arthur Berger, Gunther Schuller, Leon Kirchner, Randolph Coleman, Mario Davidovsky, Donald Martino, Robert Newell, John McIvor Perkins, Loren Rush, Harvey Sollberger, David del Tredici and Charles Wuorinen.

Polite, Innocent

Most of them were depressingly inarticulate. Not only did most seem unable or unwilling to explain themselves or their music, but also they displayed a kind of polite, innocent arrogance.

"You must grow a new ear," one of them said with a grin to a questioner who suggested that the new music was so much like noise as to be beyond his understanding.

And they looked almost cherubic as one said, in all sincerity, "But we cannot do otherwise without destroying our integrity."

We certainly wouldn't ask them to be dishonest. We can only say that Bach fought with and wrote for his bosses while so thoroughly perfecting the baroque style that music had to go in another direction; that Haydn invented the symphony practically singlehanded while employed as a musical lackey in uniform; that Mozart invented the piano concerto practically singlehanded while writing strictly to please audiences so that they would buy tickets to concerts; that Mozart and Haydn moved music farther and faster than it has moved in any other 50-year period.

Spent Time Worrying

There was no effort during the three discussions to claim that today's serious composers are writing to be appreciated by a larger, non-cerebral, less esoteric audience.

Nevertheless, 15 of them spent one and a half hours worrying out loud in front of an audience of 200 containing 50 visiting public school music teachers that something must be done to educate the public to like (understand) new music.

No mention was made of educating the composers to like (understand) human personality.

"Take me as I am or not at all," they were saying, while we were saying silently, "Write as you please, of course, but stop bellyaching if no one likes your music — if the style you have been working at for 50 years has not attracted an audience big enough to plug up my ear."

Obscure Pace

Why is Schoenberg, who 50 years ago set the obscure pace his followers are still running, still considered "modern" by listeners when Mozart and Haydn were hitting the big-time at the end of their careers in a shorter span?

Are the listeners really at fault because they continue to reject atonalism?

Maybe. Partly.

Fact Remains

The fact remains, however, that the human personality has always responded to rhythm, melody, harmony and order.

Today's composers may write as they wish and plead for support if they wish, but the fact remains that music's strongest appeal has been to the intellect and the emotions and that this appeal is made rhythmically through the feet (marches, dances), melodically through the heart (song, with ordinariness through the head (pattern, form) and harmonically through the heart (song), with orderli- system.

Today's composers are using a great deal of talent and energy to find ways to put together collections of sound that deliberately avoid recognizable melody, harmony and rhythm.

Some of them write music, too, and there is an outside chance that deep in the heart of turmoil there is peace.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,191
AUG 15 1964
NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Sunday Republican
Sun. Circ. 114,397
AUG 16 1964

LENOX FESTIVAL ON TV TODAY

LENOX—The Festival of Contemporary American Music which concluded Thursday at Tanglewood summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be depicted in part as a segment of NBC's "Sunday" program today. A crew from the "Sunday" program spent two days at Tanglewood filming portions of the "Festival Within a Festival" which featured twelve world premieres. The new music was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago and Samuel Wechsler of New York.

The "Sunday" program will present interviews with Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, and Aaron Copland, chairman of the faculty and head of the music center's department of composition. Portions of the rehearsals for this week's contemporary music concerts will also be shown.

Herald
D. 282,005 SUN. 963
AUG 23 1964

Whither music?

Ah, the age-old portents of imminent aleatory, total serial music and the happy dadaism whatever will be.

The Berkshire Foundation have contributed to that one this summer it's already happened and it is pretty remarkable.

The answer can be music festival of modern once, really are you involved, all but a few couple with some

There's talent and music of the future

One thing emerges crowded week of concerts and discussions: The exciting creative ferment which is accomplishment of a whole new

There has been some serial stuff and, by chance, choose another here breaks away from and mutually exclusive chance music that is gardeism only a-life

The old mutual are down, the old guard composers now stand to the polemics of the don't even interest

Instead, a wide instrumental techniques possibilities of the past beyond the expanded and perceptibility of and perception is a deal of this music is imaginative to the extremes of pitch and tempo but great way out of the realm ance practice.

There is no end and exciting developments with performers on the widest kind herence, exploiting in meaningful ways

There are pitfalls not a magic key

Herald
D. 282,005
AUG 15

By Eric

Another set up a crammed week of contem Thursday night new pieces com the Fromm Fo another three drier on the pa

Donald Ma quintet was easiest nut to hardest to chew a complex twe of great intelle and honesty and demandin

The piece we cause, like hi earlier, there is and finesse to and partly be is a step beyo abstract trio the nature of and the cha struments. only young who is conti the ideals of

Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

AUG 2 3 1964

Young Talent At Tanglewood

by Eric Salzman

TANGLEWOOD.

Whither music?

Ah, the age-old question fraught with all its usual portents of imminent doom. Twelve-tone music and aleatory, total serialization and chance, stochastic music and the happenings, dada, neo-dada and grand-dada—whatever will happen to us all?

The Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Foundation have come up with a pretty good answer to that one this summer: A great deal is happening, it's already happening right now, and a good deal of it is pretty remarkable.

The answer came in the form of a contemporary-music festival of music by young composers who, for once, really are young. There are ten composers involved, all but a couple still in their 20s and all but a couple with something to say.

There's talent in these here hills and there's a music of the future and it's here right now.

One thing emerged very clearly from an intense, crowded week of new-music rehearsals, performances and discussion: There is in progress a remarkable and exciting creative development in American music which is accomplishing nothing less than the establishment of a whole new kind of performed music.

There has been, in fact, a little electronic music, some serial stuff a la Stockhausen and a bit of Cageian chance, choose and change. But most of the best music here breaks away from the restricted, closely worked and mutually exclusive categories of the serial and chance music that constituted the twin poles of avant-gardeism only a little while ago.

The old mutual distinctions are gone, the barriers are down, the old fights have been fought. The young composers now start out with a complete indifference to the polemics of a few years ago; the old problems don't even interest them.

Instead, a whole range of compositional and instrumental technique is suddenly open, extending the possibilities of the creative experience right up to and beyond the expanding limits of performance technique and perceptibility—indeed, this new range of activity and perception is the actual subject matter of a great deal of this music. This music is free, wide-ranging, imaginative to the point of wildness, traveling to the extremes of pitch range, dynamics, accent, intensity and tempo but growing in a very rich and meaningful way out of the realities of performance and performance practice.

There is no question that all this is a very healthy and exciting development. The new music is tied in with performers and actual performance and it banks on the widest kind of imaginative and expressive coherence, exploiting the whole range of new resources in meaningful ways.

There are problems, too. Imagination run riot is not a magic key to anything by itself, and there is a tendency for some of the young composers, as they begin to feel their oats, to begin to assume that anything they could possibly conceive will be almost automatically interesting and somehow coherent. As other musical factors become more and more important in the shaping of a piece, there is a tendency to become careless about pitch (i.e., rhythms and colors are perfectly conceived but the actual frequencies have no more significance than their general contour). Amid all the wildness, there is always the tendency and the danger that imagination will imply intellectual irresponsibility.

These are very real dangers and some of these problems have been very much in evidence. But they can be avoided or overcome by those creative talents willing and able to understand that only small minds are unable to accept certain values and intellectual ideas without sacrificing others.

New York has been represented here by a sizable and talented contingent of composers: Indeed, the New York composers have stood out so strikingly that one is tempted to define a new New York school of performance-practice music.

Two of the New Yorkers, Charles Wuorinen and Harvey Sollberger, have long been associated through their new-music concerts at Columbia and through the fact that they constantly write pieces for each other to play.

The association continued up here with pianist Wuorinen's chamber concerto, written and even growing out of the sound of Sollberger's flute. The solo sounds in this piece climb from rock flute bottom to tip-top and then some; the range of accents and dynamics is incredible; and effects like the use of a controlled increasing and decreasing vibrato on held notes must be heard to be believed.

The music whistles, hoots, splutters, hisses, rumbles, clatters and shakes but the piece is always a good deal more than mere clever sound; timbres, textures and intensities function virtually as the themes of the piece. It has sense and an expressive imagination that comes out of these very ideas.

Sollberger's big contribution was a set of chamber variations, closely related to the Wuorinen piece in certain respects but more open, more filled with space, more dependent on the play of flashing insistent ensemble sonority and the tension between fixed and free.

Another New York composer-performer was the guitarist Stanley Silverman, who was represented by his Canso for chorus and an ensemble of plucked instruments, a piece which commanded admiration both for the quality of the choral writing and for the delicate accent of the ensemble sound weaving in and around the voices. The conception here is not quite complete, but the quality of the intention that motivates the composer is remarkable and clear.

The Argentinian composer Mario Davidovsky, now living in New York, was represented by two elegant and delightful—the words are carefully chosen—works for instruments with electronic tape. Even the problems of electronic music here are related to a new integrated conception of the role of an imaginative performed music.

Another New York talent, David del Tredici, was, from a certain point of view, the most conservatively oriented composer here. Yet his involvement with big motion and with cycles of whirling periodic structures in a work like his "I Hear an Army" for soprano and string quartet, suggest concerns that are again becoming important after a long period of emphasis on musical asymmetry. And even works like the trio and quintet of Donald Martino—with their elegant, careful and profound serial structures—show a development toward an imaginative extension of these ideas into areas of greater instrumental and textural complexity and interest.

The other New Yorker, William Sydeman, at 36 the oldest and best-known of the group, was the only composer who was not here on a Fromm grant; he was chosen rather through the center and the Wechsler Foundation. Both of Sydeman's works, a chamber quartet and a big dramatic cantata on a text derived from Euripides, made a considerable impression. Sydeman uses a whole battery of far-out techniques but he has an uncanny ability to throw in the whole avant-garde machinery, a couple of issues of "Die Reihe," and a Princeton seminar to boot, as if it were the simplest, most normal way of making music in the world. The pieces are really of great effect, clever and direct. Almost neo-classical avant-garde.

Of the Mid-Western and Western composers, only Lorn Rush from California and, to a limited degree, Randolph Coleman of Evanston, Ill., were importantly concerned with chance and improvisation. Both of these composers as well as John MacIvor Perkins of Chicago—the composer of a pair of well-made but narrow, constricted, abstract serial works—seem somehow to be concerned with older ideas, formulated by others and as yet uncomfortably and self-consciously articulated.

The performances had their ups and downs, but in general the performers—most of them from fellowship players—turned in what were mostly miracles of skill and communication in preparing great gobs of incredibly difficult and strange new music in a few days of overwhelmingly intense concentrated work. The audiences were good-sized and amazingly with it all the way—even to the point of being uncritical. Frankly, I doubt whether any of us—performers, listeners, composers, critics—will ever be quite the same. Now, that's my defintion of a real music festival.

Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

AUG 1 5 1964

Tanglewood: The Wrapup Six

By Eric Salzman

LENOX, Mass.

Another set of six wrapped up a crammed Tanglewood week of contemporary music Thursday night; three brand new pieces commissioned by the Fromm Foundation and another three hardly much drier on the page.

Donald Martino's wind quintet was probably the easiest nut to crack and the hardest to chew; that is, it is a complex twelve-tone piece of great intellectual integrity and honesty and is also long and demanding on everybody.

The piece works partly because, like his trio heard earlier, there is real elegance and finesse to the conception and partly because—and this is a step beyond the rather abstract trio—it grows out of the nature of the ensemble and the character of the instruments. Martino is the only young composer here who is continuing to pursue the ideals of our complex and rich twelve-tone music, and if he can square it with a real performance conception and a communication in meaningful psychological time—as he begins to do here—he will have accomplished something quite extraordinary.

John MacIvor Perkins' Music For Thirteen Players is, on the other hand, one of those constructed pieces laid out in such flat obvious planes that it sounds almost like a diagram for a piece—it twitches, it percusses, it post-Webernizes and then back again. Some of it is not without interest but (if the word in any of its senses applies to a piece in strict three-quarter time) the conception is strictly square.

The third new piece, a piano concerto by Robert Newell has a kind of Schoenberg-out-of-Kirchner piano part which is not badly written. The orchestral parts, however, are hopeless; The composer simply does not know how to handle instruments and ensembles.

Two of the other compositions were big, impressive piano pieces, including a fat, virtuoso set of wild Charles Wuorinen piano variations, jammed full of notes and spaces, big gestures and deep breaths. The notes don't matter much at all, only the contours and textures, but the piece has real shape and power none the less.

David Del Tredici's fantasy pieces for piano constitute a kind of homage to Schumann, shaped in an oddly original and touching way. Del Tredici's commitment to a certain kind of expressive sound and intense, almost neo-tonal technique of repetition makes his music unique among that of the young composers here.

Randolph Coleman's Projection No. 3 for flute, oboe and clarinet is one of those shuffle-the-cards pieces in which six different segments—three of which are the other three backwards—can be read off in thirty-six different ways. Two of the possibilities were performed; one way is probably as good as the next. From a certain point of view the detailed writing is perfectly competent, but the weakness of the over-all conception and the insistent overriden wind scoring do not help matters much.

The fact that this festival was possible at all was due to the remarkable efforts of a few people working with Gunther Schuller and, of course, to the performers, the nucleus of which were the Fromm Fellowship players—Melvin Strauss, conductor; Sophie Sollberger, flute; Paul Zukossay, violin; John Bergamo, percussion, and Mr. Del Tredici, piano were some of the most outstanding. To ignore the performance problems of the week would be impossible, but not to credit the extraordinary work accomplished in an incredibly short time would be a mistake.

THE NATIONAL OBSERVER
WASHINGTON, D. C.
W. 205,878
PAGE ONE
AUG 17 1964

New Faces, New Sounds

Is Music Entering a Rich New Era?

LENOX, MASS.

Perhaps the Mozart of the Twentieth Century walked the lush green lawn of Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony, last week during the Festival of Contemporary American Music. Perhaps not.

At least the five-day festival was the most ambitious and most concentrated project so far this century to encourage young composers. At least the works premiered here offered hints of the directions in which contemporary music is heading.

Months ago the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago commissioned nine of the nation's most promising composers to write new works for the festival. Tanglewood in the past few weeks turned into a sort of musical proving ground, as the composers touched up their works in rehearsals and listened last week to the applause—in some cases, to the snickers—of sophisticated audiences.

To the untrained ear, most of the music sounded harsh and dissonant, as if civilization had finally gone berserk. Nothing quite approached startling compositions of the past, such as Toshi Ichiyanagi's repetition of a single elbow-smash chord over 500 times or John Cage's piano piece Four Minutes Thirty Seconds, a "silent composition" in "three movements" during which the pianist sits at the piano and plays nothing. Still, a fashionably dressed teen-age girl termed the festival compositions "the weirdest things—like something out of the Twilight Zone." Muttered a free-lance photographer: "I feel like crawling up a wall."

—Whitestone Photo

In a Tanglewood rehearsal, modern musicians make modern music.

Esteemed composers, however, saw evidence of exceptional promise. Aaron Copland, widely acknowledged as the dean of American composers, declared in the solitude of his second-story office at Tanglewood that the new works prove "we're in the middle of a very lively era."

Gunther Schuller, a gifted composer, conductor, and performer, was less cautious as he munched on a lettuce-and-tomato sandwich. "The fluency, the competence, the intelligence some of these men display at their young age is absolutely unprecedented." The United States, said the 38-year-old Mr. Schuller, stands on the verge of a rich, rewarding era of composition that historians may some day compare with the Europe of the early Nineteenth Century.

An Intriguing Promise

Rewarding or not, the new era promises a vitality and variety unknown in American musical history. The promise intrigued the many music educators, the several music publishers, and an eminent conductor who attended the festival.

"When you drive along the road, you see this and you see that," said Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, as he walked hurriedly across the Tanglewood lawn. "But when you go up in a helicopter, you see the whole landscape." He stopped and put his hand on his listener's arm to make his point. "That's what this festival does. It gives us a bird's-eye view—no, a bird's-ear sound—of the landscape in contemporary music."

The landscape, to judge by the works of the festival composers, is almost limitless.

Instruments? They vary from the piano in David del Tredici's Fantasy Pieces for Piano to electronic music in Mario Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 1, for Flute and Tape Recorder.

Styles? They range from the systematic, as in Harvey Sollberger's Chamber Variations for Twelve Players and Conductor, to the improvised, as in Loren Rush's Mandala Music—Improvisations for Three or More Performers. Mr. Sollberger arranges various elements, such as rhythm, dynamics, and pitch, in a systematic process; Mr. Rush constructs what he calls "a kind of musician's erector set" that requires the musicians to improvise; it sounds different every time it's played.

Conflicting Scores

Scores? Compare the score for Robert Newell's Concerto for Piano and Chamber Orchestra with the score for Mr. Rush's Mandala Music. The first is conventional, the second bewildering—at least to the uninitiated.

The composers themselves differ widely in background and temperament. John MacIvor Perkins studied in France with Nadia Boulanger and at Harvard with Walter Piston; Loren Rush received his entire training in California. David del Tredici, who wrote the haunting I Hear an Army to a text by James Joyce, has an effervescent personality; Charles Wuorinen, regarded by many as the nation's most gifted young composer, strikes the casual acquaintance as being humorless and reserved.

The Fromm composers share just two characteristics. They're young, ranging in age from Mr. Newell's 24 to Donald Martino's 33. And they're talented.

Talent alone counted in their selection. Paul Fromm, a Chicago wine importer who operates his foundation almost singlehandedly ("boards," he says disdainfully, "are, by definition, long, narrow, and made of wood"), asked a number of composition teachers to recommend outstanding young composers. Mr. Fromm then asked the 200 composers nominated to send him one representative score. A committee of three distinguished composers narrowed the field to 54, and a second committee headed by Aaron Copland made the final selections.

'Trappings Unimportant'

Festival planners disclaim any conscious effort to select representatives of the various streams of contemporary music. "The trappings," says the 57-year-old Mr. Fromm, "are unimportant. What's important is whether the composer says something, and what it is he says." Still, the judges' definition of "originality"—one of the traits sought—excluded a number of young composers who write in the tradition of Howard Hanson and Samuel Barber and of the Nineteenth Century Romanticists before them.

Not that Paul Fromm or the composers he commissions worship every avant-garde piece because it's original. "There's nothing so revolting as a professional avant-gardist," charges Mr. Wuorinen. "Look at Karl Heinze Stockhausen (a German composer). He feels compelled to think up a new gimmick every week, and now he has run out of gimmicks."

Yet the festival community feels strongly that, as composer Arnold Schoenberg once wrote, "If it's art, it must be new art." Explains Mr. Fromm: "Any composer who tries to rely on the past—or, what's worse, writes in cliches—dedicates himself to a lost cause."

Mr. Fromm likes to quote a critic of an earlier day who wrote: "His music is amusical, incoherent, and ear-splitting." He leans over his breakfast coffee. "Who was this critic writing about? Was it Schoenberg? Was it Stravinsky? It was Beethoven. The critic was writing in 1806."

They Deserve a Hearing

Mr. Fromm acknowledges that not every contemporary composer is a Beethoven, not every contemporary piece a masterpiece. But he insists that young composers deserve a hearing.

"Young composers are at a real disadvantage today," he says. "First, they're not performed as often as they should be. Second, when they are performed, they're put on programs with the masters. Third, and worst of all, they're compared with the best works of the masters. You never hear Beethoven's Battle Symphony, a really feeble work. You always hear his Ninth."

Since the Fromm Foundation was founded in 1952, it has sponsored concerts of contemporary music, commissioned new works, awarded prizes for exceptional recent works, and placed the thousands of scores it has screened on microfilm. Fromm fellowships have been awarded to about a dozen young performers each year since 1957 to play contemporary works at Tanglewood. Not until this year, however, have Fromm composers assisted the Fromm performers in the rehearsals of their Tanglewood premieres.

The financial rewards for Fromm composers are modest enough, especially when compared with grants awarded by such large institutions as the Rockefeller Foundation. Fromm composers at Tanglewood received $350 to write their commissioned work, $100 for copying costs, and $200 for their living expenses during their three weeks at Tanglewood.

But Fromm composers calculate the value of this year's festival in more than monetary terms. The commissions, they confess frankly, inspired several works that would not have been written otherwise. Just as important, the commissions guaranteed a performance—a performance enhanced by the reputation of Tanglewood. "When avant-garde music earns the seal 'approved' here," says Mr. Davidovsky, "it has national repercussions."

The composers benefited, too, from contact with their colleagues. Whether they were listening to fellow composer William Sydeman at a panel discussion, Lincolnesque in his neatly trimmed beard, or watching a rehearsal dialog between Fromm composer Randolph Coleman and the performers, they were absorbing ideas. For California's Loren Rush, the exposure was especially helpful. Admits Gunther Schuller, considered one of the most knowledgeable men in music: "I didn't even know what the guys were doing out in California. I'd never even heard of Loren Rush."

The composers' chief complaint: The festival, if anything, was too ambitious. Playing four concerts of contemporary music in five days would tax the imagination, skill, and sanity of any musician; for the Fromm musicians to learn the difficult scores in 14-hour days over a span of three weeks was simply too much.

The inexperience and the rigorous schedule took their toll. The premier of Harvey Sollberger's Chamber Variations fell apart one-third of the way through; conductor Schuller, with several of his musicians hopelessly lost, stopped the piece and began again.

The audience, sympathetic to the conductor's plight, held the composure it had lost briefly earlier in the evening. Twitters, then laughter, had broken out over the way the five performers cued each other in Mr. Rush's Mandala Music.

The violinist stomped on the foot pedal attached to a bass drum. "Thud." Snickers leaped across the audience and a smirk, ever so slight, creased the violinist's face.

Next the xylophonist attacked a huge Oriental gong. "Bong." That set off the touch of the juvenile in everyone. The audience roared.

'What Kind of a World'

And so it went. Outside, after the concert, a man sighed. "That music," he said. "It makes one wonder what kind of a world we're heading into."

The brilliant young composers here want to communicate with the new world not on its terms, but on theirs. "We could speak in the old language," says the Argentine-born Mario Davidovsky. "We could speak in it, just as you could speak in Chaucerian English or Shakespearean English, just as I'm speaking now in a kind of bad Spanish Manhattan. But language must grow—the language of music. It must be elastic enough to incorporate new words, to communicate new thoughts."

The new generation has discarded the old vocabulary of music. It has discarded themes and tossed old forms, old structures, on the trashcan of music history. It has abandoned rhythm. "Music now is jerky and explosive," says the expressive Mr. Copland. "It pops out at you and then disappears."

The age of American nationalism in music has passed. No longer do American composers feel compelled to include cowboy tunes or revivalist hymns, as Mr. Copland did in his ballets Billy the Kid and Appalachian Spring. No longer do they use Negro spirituals as Douglas Moore did in his orchestral suite The Pageant of P. T. Barnum.

'The Third Stream'

The fashion of incorporating jazz, a truly American musical idiom, has also largely disappeared. Gunther Schuller, who built an unusual rapport with jazz musicians, created a new style he called "the third stream"—neither jazz nor serious music, but a combination of the two. Lately he has made fewer conscious allusions to jazz, although he says it inevitably continues to have a subtle influence on his works.

Mr. Schuller last week repeated the manifesto of the new approach in American music at a panel session at Tanglewood. "I'm not interested in American music just because it's American music," he said. "If it happens to be written by an Eskimo, fine."

The new approach feeds on the growing sense of internationalism in the world. It feeds also on the growing self-confidence of American composers.

"It must make the Europeans furious that we've suddenly burst forth," muses Mr. Wuorinen over a glass of brandy. "But notice that despite their long-standing patronizing attitude, you're starting to see them furtively showing up over here."

For all his brashness, Mr. Wuorinen commands perhaps the greatest following of all his contemporaries. The 26-year-old native of New York City started composing at the age of 5, when he first jotted down a few notes on a blank sheet of music paper. The composer of 20 prize-winning works, he now teaches at Columbia University. Colleagues credit him with a fertile imagination, immense control, and a skillful blending of sounds.

'Like Looking at a Tree'

Harvey Sollberger, an accomplished flutist, is a month older than Mr. Wuorinen. With Mr. Wuorinen, he is co-director of the Columbia University Group for Contemporary Music. His Chamber Variations won high praise from conductor Schuller: "For his age, that is an extraordinary piece in detail and imagination. It's like looking at a tree, on which every leaf is different."

Donald Martino, a Yale professor, has attracted interest for the originality and compact structure his compositions display. Mario Davidovsky, who composes in the laboratory of the Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center in New York City, is achieving a reputation as a rich colorist, a creator of what the initiated term "contemporary melody." Mr. Davidovsky tape-records sounds produced by a sound generator, a radio-like device with dials that control volume and pitch; often he blends these tape-recordings with actual instruments.

The sounds these men produce do not always please the ear of even the most sympathetic listener. Their patron, Mr. Fromm, insists this is not important.

"I do not desire you to please me," he says, quoting Jacques' words to Amiens in Shakespeare's As You Like It. "I do desire you to sing." —LEE E. DIRKS Performers practiced 14 hours a day at the Tanglewood festival.

—Whitestone Photo

Puzzle for performers: The score for Loren Rush's Mandala Music. The musicians move from one section to another on their own cues; the notes indicate the range within which they improvise.

NEW YORK
ournal American
D. 506,746 SUN. 640,586

AUG 3 0 1964

WHAT'S HAPPENING TO MUSIC?

By MILES KASTENDIECK

JUXTAPOSITION PROVIDED a provocative element in the Festival of Contemporary American Music held at the Berkshire Music Center this month. Music by the young avant-gardists and by some "old pros" in the modern field presented some startling contrasts. These became most interesting when dates revealed that some of this music had been composed within a decade.

●

AFTER HEARING the new scores commissioned by the Fromm Foundation, the average listener might well emerge confused as to the composers' aims.

To be sure, some have committed themselves to serial music, others to atonal expression, still others to some kind of mathematical mumbo jumbo. Whatever their means, the question arises as to the end attained. What if the average listener derives no emotional satisfaction from what he hears?

Hearing a program of quartets by Elliott Carter, Arthur Berger, Gunther Schuller, and Leon Kirchner—the "old pros" of the festival—the audience listened intently to all, but it responded most to the music of Schuller and Kirchner.

Carter's well-known Second Quartet elicited admiration and respect. Berger's work limited that reaction to those keenly appreciative of the intellectual concept and the meticulous technique involved.

Schuller's First Quartet, the oldest on the program, caught the imagination, for all its serialization. It remained, however, for Kirchner's Second Quartet to stir the listeners. Perhaps the romantic quality of his music alerted them. Possibly a kinship to Schoenberg's "Verklarte Nacht" brought a responsive chord. There was no doubt that Kirchner had communicated more immediately than the others.

What this all means cannot be resolved quickly. Having ventured farther, the younger composers make the gap bigger and raise questions once again about reaching their immediate audience. Writing for immortality will do them no good as Erich Leinsdorf has pointed out this Summer. Writing for their own contemporaries or just to start a new trend, they will not fare much better.

The average music lover may be justifiably confused. That he wonders what is happening to music is not an unfounded bewilderment. In the sixth decade of the century we are still experimenting. No distinctive trend has become established. Serial music is very much with us, but many are quite convinced by now that it is a dead end.

●

WHAT REMAINS TO plague the contemporary composer everlastingly is the need to communicate beyond the circle of musicians in which he so often finds himself circumscribed.

However intellectual the concept behind a piece, it must still express a feeling. The Great Composers of the past did not hesitate to do that. Kirchner really projected something which the audience recognized beyond his skillful writing.

The secret remains that to communicate a composer must look into his heart and write.

Miles Kastendieck reviews musical events regularly in the daily Journal-American.

BLANK PAGE

OBITUARIES

167

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
NOV 3 1963

Tanglewood's Bully Demanded the Shed

By MARGO MILLER

MILLER

One obituary headline called Gertrude Robinson Smith the "Mother" of Tanglewood. It was a gracious gesture but an inaccurate word. She was a bully.

It is just this quality which founds the world's festivals, keeps American symphony orchestras and concert series, indeed much cultural life, bubbling. While conductors polish the hemidemisemiquavers, the ladies prod the public.

Gertrude Robinson Smith was hardly the sweet, little old lady the word "mother" might suggest. Another obituary called her a "pioneer." She was born in 1881, to Charles Robinson Smith, a New York lawyer, and his wife, a lifelong patron of the arts. The family divided its time between Manhattan and Paris, and the children were raised in the tradition that the strongest virtue of the well-to-do was civic-mindedness.

She affected rather mannish dress, wearing Panama hats during the Summer, and had built her own country home. Her short figure was as boxy as the prewar green Buick which she drove herself until a few years ago. At committee meetings, she sat poised upon her cane, set directly before her. She demanded good manners, insisted that "the public" be treated fairly at all times.

Community Project

Tanglewood, or more strictly speaking, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, began in 1934, after Dr. Henry Hadley, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, confided to Miss Robinson Smith his dream of Summer concerts. She summoned 64 men and women to tea at The Residence, her place in Stockbridge, to form committees.

Two months later, in a horse show ring in Lenox, the orchestra played three concerts to 5000 persons. The deficit was $413.30, and another series was held in 1935, drawing 9000. Criticism of Hadley's programs and the crude facilities of the circus tent, erected against Berkshire weather, only made the committee aspire to better things.

Miss Robinson Smith was empowered to talk to other orchestras. Her appointment with Serge Koussevitzky, set for 15 minutes, lasted two hours. So the Boston Symphony travelled to another Lenox estate in 1936 for three concerts before 15,000 ticket holders. Then in 1937, Mrs. Gorham Brooks and her aunt, Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappen, gave the family estate, Tanglewood, to Koussevitzky. He had demanded an orchestral shell and pavilion in which to perform. All the committee could promise was a better tent. Then it happened.

Upon the canvas, on the site of the present Theater-Concert Hall and under the "Hawthorne pines," rain began to fall the evening of Aug. 12, 1937. Thunder did its part by drowning out "The Ride of the Valkries." The French horns shipped water.

Miss Robinson Smith strode to the stage and addressed the audience: "Now do you see why we must have a permanent building for these concerts." Later that night, $30,000 was pledged for the purpose. She raised an additional $50,000, enough to build the 6000-seat Music Shed in time for the 1938 season. And until 1955, when the Berkshire Symphonic Festival corporation dissolved, turning the Shed over to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, she remained chairman.

Tanglewod began as a community enterprise, employing during those depression years local construction workers on the Shed, volunteer help in the ticket booths. Then as now, local students and adults act as ushers and program distributors. The present eight-week season is said to help bring some $2.5 million worth of tourist business to the Berkshires. And the Boston Symphony counts heavily on ticket sales as part of its annual budget.

In all of this Gertrude Robinson Smith was a powerful, if often a disquieting force. Consider her written invitation to hear Dr. Hadley present his dream: "I am sure you will agree with me that there are few things artistically more enchanting than listening to a beautiful symphony orchestra on a Summer evening outdoors under the stars." While the sentence trails off romantically, the opening words, "I am sure you will agree with me," are Miss Robinson Smith speaking, confident of no contradiction.

Doubtless, a similar statement began her appeal for funds for surgical motor units in World War I (with the novelist Edith Wharton she raised $70,000 for the French), or for the Ice Flotilla Committee ($100,000 for refrigeration at the front), or for the Vacation Savings Stamp Fund for working girls, or the clubhouse for businesswomen ($8 million), now the Henry Hudson Hotel in New York, or the French Theater at the Barbizon Plaza.

France made Miss Robinson Smith a Chevalier (later an officer) of the Legion of Honor. Two years previously her father had been decorated; they were one of only two American father-daughter combinations ever honored. The Boston Symphony acknowledged her services with a Tanglewod concert in 1961.

Miss Robinson Smith was, unhappily, an anachronism her last decade at Tanglewood. She was of that vanishing breed which gave At Homes in New York; there over tea or cocktails one might meet someone's protege, now in the Philharminic; retired diplomats; patrons of the arts of Miss Smith's class; artists fresh from recital. And much the same crowd was to be seen Summers in the row of Tanglewood boxes.

It is doubtful that many attending Berkshire Festival concerts knew she existed. The public streamed in wearing shorts (and sometimes less). Miss Robinson Smith would often indicate with her cane a particularly fine specimen of piano legs going past. If any monument to the "mother" of Tanglewood is contemplated, it should be the issuing of wrap-around skirts to tourists. This was once done, but the style was so popular that the supply disappeared as souvenirs of Tanglewood. Concerts were occasions inviting respect, as she was sure you'd agree.

ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
D. 64,387
OCT 23 1963

Miss Smith Dies; Festival Founder

New York (UPI)—Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, founder of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, died last night at New York Hospital.

The 82-year-old music patron, who formed the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Inc. in 1934 had suffered a stroke four weeks ago.

The first concerts were given by the New York Philharmonic on a farm in Stockbridge, Mass. where Miss Smith had a summer home. In 1936, the Boston Symphony Orchestra began participating in the concerts, which Miss Smith had begun as a local music festival.

The festival grew until today it is one of the nation's most renowned musical endeavors, situated in Western Massachusetts' Berkshire Mountains. Tanglewood now belong to the Boston Symphony.

Born into wealth, Miss Smith was the daughter of the late Charles Robinson Smith and the former Jeannie Porter Steel Smith.

During World War 1 she and novelist Edith Wharton worked together to raise more than $170,000 for war relief.

Earlier this year, she was appointed to the advisory committee of the National Cultural Center in Washington.

Surviving is her sister, Mrs. Lyman Beecher Stowe.

GARDEN CITY, N.Y.
NEWSDAY
D. 344,789
OCT 24 1963

Gertrude R. Smith, 82; Founded Music Festival

New York (UPI)—Gertrude Robinson Smith, founder of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, died Tuesday night at New York Hospital.

The 82-year-old music patron, who formed the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., in 1934, had suffered a stroke four weeks ago. The first concerts were given by the New York Philharmonic on a farm in Stockbridge, Mass., where Miss Smith had a summer home. In 1936, the Boston Symphony Orchestra began participating in the concerts, which Miss Smith had begun as a local music festival. The festival grew until today, it is one of the nation' most renowned musical endeavors, situated in the rear of western Massachusetts' mountain country. Tanglewood now belongs to the Boston Symphony.

Born into wealth, she was the daughter of the late Charles Robinson Smith and the former Jeannie Porter Steel Smith. During World War I she and novelist Edith Wharton worked together, raising more than $170,000 for war relief. Earlier this year, she was appointed to the advisory committee of the National Cultural Center in Washington. Surviving is her sister, Mrs. Lyman Beecher Stowe.

SCHENECTADY, N.Y.
UNION STAR
D. 36,240
OCT 25 1963

Many Indebted To Her

MISS GERTRUDE ROBINSON Smith died in New York at the age of 82. Probably few Schenectady area residents could identify her. Yet thousands of them owe her a debt of gratitude for many happy hours. She was the founder of the Berkshire Music Festival that grew into what is now known as Tanglewood.

In 1936, with the depression still hanging over the country, she invited a group of neighbors to consider the possibility of a music festival in the Berkshires. She told them: "I am sure you will agree with me that there are few things artistically more enchanting than listening to a beautiful symphony orchestra on a summer evening outdoors under the stars."

Countless thousands, many of them from this section of New York state, will agree, and revere her memory for having "obeyed the impulse" to do something about her dream. She didn't develop Tanglewood alone, but without her initiative, it might never have come into being.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302
NOV 3 1963

Tanglewood's Prime Mover Deserves More Than Plaque

By IRVING KOLODIN

NEW YORK—If, as is generally agreed, the Berkshire Festival (familiarly known as Tanglewood) is the most durable monument created by its first conductor and long-time director Serge Koussevitsky, how much more of a monument is it to the person who persuaded him to come there in the first place? This thought is a natural aftermath to the recent death, in New York City at the ripe age of 82, of the prime mover in the whole project that has made this corner of Massachusetts an annual objective for music lovers nation-wide.

I first met Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith even before there was a Tanglewood, or a festival there, in 1935. A lifetime summer resident of the beautiful town of Stockbridge, as well as an attendant at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in New York since childhood, she had decided that life in the summer months was incomplete without symphonic music. Her first move was to found the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, and bring in the New York Philharmonic under the direction of Henry Hadley, an American conductor-composer, for a three-concert series on an estate known as the Hanna Farm.

However, the Philharmonic had its Lewisohn Stadium commitment as barrier to prolonged participation in such a summer series, and it was, in a sense, on alien ground in Massachusetts anyway. A lifelong subscriber to the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony, Miss Robinson Smith petitioned for a 15-minute appointment with Koussevitsky, and passed two hours in an exposition of the opportunities and rewards of bringing the Boston Symphony to the Berkshires. Koussevitsky agreed to a trial at the Hanna Farm in 1936, with a huge circus tent for shelter. The next year the Tanglewood estate, famous for its associations with Nathaniel Hawthorne, was made available to the festival by its owners, and the location was stabilized where it has remained for a quarter of a century.

There was, however, a crisis when the whole scheme might have collapsed. This was on the August evening in 1937 when the Boston Symphony gave its first concert in Tanglewood. A dark humid day, such as may come to any resort in August, it exploded in a violent thunderstorm midway through the program, of such intensity that even Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" had to be interrupted and a nationwide radio audience informed that the program was off. As the rain poured down and the audience waited, Koussevitsky issued an ultimatum: "No shed, no more concerts."

Nothing dismayed, Miss Robinson Smith made her way to the platform and told the audience that it was up to them to decide whether the concerts stayed or went. The next day, at her pleasant lodge in the Berkshire woods, a gathering of local residents began the work of raising $100,000, not only to put a floor under the festival but a roof over the heads of the orchestra. Eventually the building was turned over to the orchestra.

A native New Yorker, the daughter of a lawyer father (Charles Robinson Smith) and a mother with an interest in the arts, Miss Robinson Smith was as familiar with the art life of Paris as with that of New York, for she lived there months every year until lately, when a stroke curtailed her mobility. A woman of privileged birth, she nevertheless learned early in life that privileges beget responsibilities, and was incessantly active in philanthropic and social activities. Undoubtedly, however, what will be longest remembered of her was an outgrowth of her hobby, music. She deserves more than the plaque on the shed at Tanglewood honoring her name.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,084
OCT 24 1963

Miss Robinson Smith, Festival Founder

Tanglewood today is such a Berkshire institution that it requires an effort of imagination to conceive of the county without it. Yet 30 years ago we had no summer music festival, and it took even more vision to conjure one up.

That vision was possessed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith. It was her capacity to recognize the potential in a "dream" broached to her by Dr. Henry Hadley one day in 1934 that made Tanglewood as we know it a reality.

It was Miss Robinson Smith who gathered 64 men and women to her house to hear Dr. Hadley present his idea for outdoor symphony concerts in the Berkshires. It was Miss Robinson Smith who, as president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., led the organization through its two early seasons at the Hanna farm in Interlaken. It was Miss Robinson Smith who negotiated with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the first appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 1936 Festival at Holmwood.

And it was Miss Robinson Smith who spearheaded the 1937 campaign for the "pavilion" or shed at the Festival's new home on the 200-acre Tappan estate overlooking Stockbridge Bowl.

After that triumph, the Berkshire Festival's future was secure. Miss Robinson Smith, who had served continuously as its president from 1934, retired from active organizational work 20 years later when the festival corporation was dissolved and the Music Shed turned over to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From that time till her death Tuesday in New York, she stayed in the background.

Yet in these later years Miss Robinson Smith remained a Tanglewood presence, a personification of the imagination and leadership that established the festival. From time to time her advice was sought on Tanglewood problems. Occasionally she spoke out on such matters as proper dress for evening concerts (she frowned on shorts for women and tieless shirts for men).

But her crowning work had been done years before; and in a sense the great Shed and the magnificent concerts played in it every July and August constitute her monument.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
American (e)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,020
OCT 23 1963

Berkshire Symphonic Festival Fonnder Dies

NEW YORK (AP) — Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, 82, who founded a music festival in western Massachusetts that ultimately became the world-famous Tanglewood Festival, died last night at New York City Hospital.

Miss Robinson Smith was a summer resident of Stockbridge, Mass., in 1934 when she founded the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc.

The idea for the project came from Henry Hadley an American composer and conductor.

The festival was a community affair with American Legion members handling the parking and students acting as ushers. The concerts were staged at a farm near Stockbridge.

In 1936, the Boston Symphony Orchestra participated in a four-day program which drew 15,000 listeners. Last summer, the orchestra drew more than 230,000 people to its eight-week season.

Miss Robinson Smith organized a campaign in 1937 to acquire land and permanent buildings for the festival.

On her 80th birthday in 1961, Dr. Charles Munch, then music director of the Boston Symphony conducted a special Tanglewood program in her honor.

WASHINGTON, D.C.
NEWS
D. 193,013 S: 156,632
OCT 24 1963

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN-TIMES
D. 543,420 S. 651,327
OCT 25 1963

PONTIAC, MICH.
PRESS
D. 62,562
OCT 24 1963

EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
D. 48,021
OCT 24 1963

NEW YORK (UPI) — The founder of the famed Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, died Tuesday night in a hospital here. Miss Smith, 81, was born in New York, but lived during the summers in Stockbridge, Mass., not far from Lenox, where the Tanglewood concerts were

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447
OCT 23 1963

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Founder of Tanglewood, Dead

Music Patron Began Series on a Farm in Berkshires —Aided World War I Relief

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, music patron and founder of the Berkshire, Mass., music festival, a forerunner of Tanglewood, died yesterday at New York Hospital. She had suffered a stroke a month ago. Her age was 82. She lived at 1 Sutton Place South.

Miss Robinson Smith, a summer resident of Stockbridge, Mass., founded the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., in 1934. The Boston Symphony Orchestra started participating in 1936.

"I am sure you will agree with me that there are few things artistically more enchanting than listening to a beautiful symphony orchestra on a summer evening outdoors under the stars."

With these words, Miss Robinson Smith invited her neighbors in the Berkshires to consider the possibility of a local music festival and took the first giant step toward establishing the summer event that has achieved international renown.

The dream of a festival was first envisioned by Henry Hadley, conductor and composer. He spoke of it to Miss Robinson Smith, a woman of determination and much experience in getting things done. The 64 men and women, living within 40 miles of Stockbridge, eventually formed the Berkshire Symphony Festival, Inc., and elected Miss Robinson Smith president, a post she held until the group dissolved in 1955.

5,000 at Concerts

Miss Robinson Smith and her co-workers did not allow the festival to become bogged down in committee. Only two months later, on Aug. 23, 1934, the festival had its premiere performance on Dan Hanna's farm, just west of Mahkeenac Lake, with 65 members of the New York Philharmonic playing under the direction of Mr. Hadley. The first festival of three concerts drew a total of 5,000 people and a small deficit of $413.30.

Miss Robinson Smith played a key role in inducing Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Berkshires in 1936. After negotiations had been going on for some time, Miss Robinson Smith secured a 15-minute appointment to convince the conductor that he should come to the little-known festival in western Massachusetts. They spoke for nearly two hours and success was practically assured.

Dr. Koussevitzky was happy about his reception but wanted a shed or a hall to enhance the acoustics of his performance and protect his orchestra from the elements. A search for a permanent location started and, shortly after, ended when Mrs. Gorham Brooks and her aunt, Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan, offered their Tanglewood estate at nearby Lenox.

Concert Ended by Rain

The first concert there, in a tent, Aug. 12, 1937, ended in a downpour that seeped through onto audience and players. Miss Robinson Smith made her way to the stage and told the audience that the storm had demonstrated the need for a shed. "We must raise the $100,000 to build it," she said. She spurred the campaign and raised $80,000, enough to build a shed in time for the 1938 season.

Since Tanglewood had become the property of the Boston Symphony, Miss Robinson Smith's group owned only the shed and this was turned over to the orchestra in 1945. The festival organization then became inactive and dissolved in 1955, turning over what money it had to the Berkshire Music Center school and to the Berkshire Community Music School in Pittsfield for scholarships.

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith as she appeared in a photo made some years ago.

Miss Robinson Smith was always a particular favorite at Tanglewood and on her 80th birthday in 1961, a concert was held in her honor.

Charles Robinson Smith, her father, was a corporation lawyer; her mother was a patron of the arts. The family lived in New York and Paris. Miss Robinson Smith, who was born in New York City, spent much of each year in France until a few years ago.

She was raised in the old tradition that the strongest virtue of the well to do was civic-mindedness. She became president of the Vacation Savings Stamp Fund nearly a half century ago. This organization, dedicated to providing vacation opportunities for working girls in Manhattan, later became the American Women's Association, which she served as president until 1928.

In a real-estate deal that the press of the day described as a good one, the group bought land on West 57th Street and Miss Robinson Smith and Ann Morgan raised $8,000,000 to build a clubhouse for businesswomen there. It is now the Henry Hudson Hotel.

Worked With Edith Wharton

During World War I, Miss Robinson Smith worked with Edith Wharton in war relief and helped raise $70,000 for surgical motor units sent from the United States to France.

She then organized the Ice Flotilla Committee, which gathered $100,000 for desperately needed ice-making machines at the front. Never one to rely on hearsay, she flew in rickety planes over the front and visited it on the ground as well. She was awarded the French Legion of Honor. Her love of French culture persisted throughout her life. She organized the French Theater at the Barbizon Plaza, a project that lasted until the outbreak of World War II.

She crossed the Atlantic 105 times by ship and received homage from the French Line on her 100th crossing. In 1932, she became chairman of a booth committee of the Emergency Unemployment Relief Committee, and directed 3,000 women raising money to help the jobless.

Miss Robinson Smith summered at Stockbridge every year since her father bought property there after World War I. In 1919, she and a friend, Miss Mirian Oliver, assisted by a Housatonic stone mason, built with their own hands a log-cabin type of home called The Residence in which she lived for many years. She had another apartment at 1 Sutton Place South here.

Early in 1963 she was appointed to the advisory committee of the National Culture Center in Washington.

She leaves a sister, Mrs. Lyman Beecher Stowe, the former Hilda Robinson Smith.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Courier
GT. BARRINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,730
OCT 24 1963

Berkshire Festival Founder Dead At 82

Was Summer Resident of Stockbridge 44 Years

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith Dies In New York After Suffering Stroke Month Ago.—First Concerts Held On Dana Farm.—Helped Acquire Tanglewood.

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, 82, founder of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., a forerunner of Tanglewood in Lenox, died at New York City Hospital Tuesday night after suffering a stroke a month ago.

Miss Smith, a summer resident of Stockbridge for 44 years, lived at 1 Sutton Place in New York City during the winter. She was born in New York and reared in New York and France. Her father, Charles Robinson Smith, a corporation lawyer, spent part of each year in France.

Miss Smith founded the Symphonic Festival in 1934. It was the idea of Henry Hadley, an American composer and conductor and the first concerts were held on the Dana farm in Stockbridge. The project was boosted by the participation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1936. Miss Smith was instrumental in acquiring the Tanglewood property and donated land and buildings herself, as well as contributing financially.

She did war relief work during World War I and was chairman of the flotilla committee of the Vacation War Relief in New York, visited front line trenches in France as a member of the French Red Cross, and raised over $100,000 for mobile ice machines which saved the lives of countless wounded. She was awarded the Legion of Honor as a Chevalier and later as an officer by the grateful French government.

Her father bought land in Glendale in 1919 and built a large house, now occupied by another daughter, Mrs. Lyman Beecher Stowe. Miss Smith built her own house all by herself in 13 weeks and has used it as her summer home ever since, although another structure was later built for her nearby.

She was the organizer of the French theater in New York, which produced plays until 1939, and had been chairman of a committee recruiting women to help raise funds for the unemployed under the Emergency Relief Committee.

On July 13, 1961, Miss Smith was honored at a special program at Tanglewood by Dr. Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on her 80th birthday. She was presented an engraved silver tray in recognition of her work in establishing the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Newark Star
NEWARK, N
D. 22[illegible]403 S.
NOV 3 196

Dr. Serge

Tang

as mo

By IRVI

If, as is gener shire Festival ( Tanglewood) is monument creat ductor and lon
Koussevitsky, th monument is it t
suaded him to c
place?

This thought to the recent dea
at the ripe age prime mover in has made this co an annual objec nation-wide.

I first met M
Smith even b
Tanglewood, or 1935. A lifetime
the beautiful to well as an att
Symphony Orch
York since child that life in the incomplete wit

HER FIRST Berkshire Sym bring in the N
under the dire an American c a three-concer known as the

However, t
Lewisohn Stad
rier to prolong a summer se sense, on alie setts anyway.
the New York
Symphony, M

Chicago
THE WORLD
NEWS
D. 831,904
JUL 1 2

Wha
Monteux, his Domain ductors in have bee tribute, Er added a co
the Berks
ule at Tan

Newark Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 221,403 S. 370,529

NOV 3 1963

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky at his last Tanglewood conecrt in 1949

THE MUSIC BOX

Tanglewood festival stands as monument to late backer

By IRVING KOLODIN

If, as is generally agreed, the Berkshire Festival (familiarly known as Tanglewood) is the most durable monument created by its first conductor and long-time director Serge Koussevitsky, how much more of a monument is it to the person who persuaded him to come there in the first place?

This thought is a natural aftermath to the recent death, in New York City at the ripe age of eighty-two, of the prime mover in the whole project that has made this corner of Massachusetts an annual objective for music lovers nation-wide.

I first met Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith even before there was a Tanglewood, or a festival there, in 1935. A lifetime summer resident of the beautiful town of Stockbridge, as well as an attendant at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in New York since childhood, she had decided that life in the summer months was incomplete without symphonic music.

* * *

HER FIRST move was to found the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and bring in the New York Philharmonic under the direction of Henry Hadley, an American conductor-composer, for a three-concert series on an estate known as the Hanna Farm.

However, the Philharmonic had its Lewisohn Stadium commitment as barrier to prolonged participation in such a summer series, and it was, in a sense, on alien ground in Massachusetts anyway. A lifelong subscriber to the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony, Miss Robinson Smith petitioned for a fifteen-minute appointment with Kosssevitsky, and passed two hours in an exposition of the opportunities and rewards of bringing the Boston Symphony to the Berkshires.

Koussevitsky agreed to a trial at the Hanna Farm in 1936, with a huge circus tent for shelter. The next year the Tanglewood estate, famous for its associations with Nathaniel Hawthorne, was made available to the festival by its owners, and the location was stabilized where it has remained for a quarter of a century.

There was, however, a crisis when the whole scheme might have collapsed. This was on the August evening in 1937 when the Boston Symphony gave its first concert in Tanglewood. A dank humid day, such as may come to any resort in August, is exploded in a violent thunderstorm midway through the program, of such intensity that even Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" had to be interrupted and a nation-wide radio audience informed that the program was off. As the rain poured down and the audience waited, Koussevitsky issued an ultimatum: "No shed, no more concerts."

* * *

NOTHING DISMAYED, Miss Robinson Smith made her way to the platform and told the audience that it was up to them to decide whether the concerts stayed or went. The next day, at her pleasant lodge in the Berkshire woods, a gathering of local residents began the work of raising $100,000, not only to put a floor under the festival but a roof over the heads of the orchestra. Eventually the building was turned over to the orchestra.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 831,904 SUN. 1,138,268

JUL 12 1964

With the death of Pierre Monteux, master classes at his Domaine School of Conductors in Hancock, Me., have been canceled. As a tribute, Erich Leinsdorf has added a conducting course to the Berkshire Festival schedule at Tanglewood Aug. 2-23.

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
D. 188,873 SUN. 277,813

JUL 6 1964

MUSIC NOTES

ERICH LEINSDORF, Director of the Berkshire Music Center, has announced the addition of a course for orchestral conductors to the Music Center's schedule at Tanglewood this summer. The late Pierre Monteux held masters' classes at the Domaine School of Conductors in Hancock, Maine. His conductorial colleagues agreed later to open a conducting course at Tanglewood as a tribute to Mr. Monteux.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
D. 29,000

JUL 2 1964

Tanglewood Takes Over Monteux Classes

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center, announces the addition of a course for orchestral conductors to the Music Center's schedule at Tanglewood this summer.

The fatal illness of Pierre Monteux forced the cancellation of his masters' classes at the Domaine School of Conductors in Hancock, Maine. His conductorial colleagues agreed to open a conducting course at Tanglewood as a tribute of friendship to Mr. Monteux.

Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra will be the chairman of this program which will last for three weeks, from Sunday, Aug. 2, to Sunday, Aug. 23.

Open to All

The course will be open to all applicants and will include seminars and discussions with Erich Leinsdorf, Richard Burgin, Aaron Copland, Lukas Foss, Max Rudolf, and Gunther Schuller; classes in solfege and baton technique; and observation at Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals and concerts under Messrs. Leinsdorf, Burgin, Seiji Ozawa, Rudolf and Leopold Stokowski. Other activities will be arranged depending on the size and skills of the enrollment.

The fee for the three-week course is $310, which includes tuition, dormitory, and miscellaneous fees. Those interested in attending should write immediately to the Registrar, Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586

JUL 5 1964

Music World Notables Attend Rites for Pierre Monteux

HANCOCK, Me.—French-born Pierre Monteux, who adopted Hancock as his hometown, came to his last resting place Saturday in the family cemetery plot.

Major figures in the music world joined family and friends in mourning Monteux, whose career as a symphony conductor spanned half a century.

The small St. Joseph's Catholic church was jammed with friends and relatives for a Mass of requiem Saturday morning.

They included conductors Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia orchestra and Max Rudolf of the Cincinnati Symphony and opera star Roberta Peters.

Monteux was 89 when he died last Wednesday in his sleep. He had been confined to bed for about nine weeks.

A family spokesman said he had fallen in a London bathtub last April and suffered a concussion. He had returned to Hancock to recuperate, but suffered several brain hemorrhages.

Last night at Lenox, Mass., the Boston Symphony opened this year's Berkshire Music Festival with a musical tribute to Monteux.

Monteux was conductor of the Boston Symphony for five years, and in recent years joined it for guest appearances. He also was music director of the San Francisco Symphony for 17 years.

(Associated Press)

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (e)
BIDDEFORD-SACO, Me.
Circ. 8,836

JUL 1 1964

Pierre Monteux Dies In Maine

HANCOCK, (AP) — French-born Pierre Monteux, a commanding figure among orchestra conductors for half a century, died early today at his home after a long illness. He was 89.

Monteux's sister, Mrs. David Michlin, said he had been confined to his bed for several months and died in his sleep.

Monteux's first conductorship was of the Ballet Russe in France in 1910. The company toured the United States in 1916 and Monteux stayed on in this country to become conductor of the French repertory of the Metropolitan Opera for three years.

He then took over as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for five years and was concertgebouw of Amsterdam's symphony for nine years.

In 1934, he returned to the United States and picked up the pieces of the faltering San Francisco Symphony, directing it for 17 years.

Monteux and his wife, Doris Hodgkins Monteux, bought an estate near her birthplace here for many summers. They moved here permanently in 1952, when Monteux stepped down at San Francisco.

Even in retirement he had made many guest conducting appearances.

* * *

Monteux once said he liked Brahms, Beethoven, Schumann and Wagner — "in that order."

"I don't like abstract music," he said. "Or abstract painting either. Modern is all right, but not abstract."

The roly-poly conductor — who stood 5-feet-5 and weighed 180 pounds — was noted for his ability to get the most from an orchestra with a minimum of gesticulations.

"He could create a storm in an orchestra with a flick of his wrist," one of his musicians once said of him.

Monteux conducted the first performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" in 1913 when it was considered revolutionary in the music world. The performance touched off riots in Paris but Monteux insisted on introducing it.

He also introduced Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" in Paris in 1912.

Monteux began his musical career in 1894 as a viola player in a Paris string quartet. He served as a "poilu," or private, in the French Army during World War I and fought in the battles of Verdun, Rheims, Boissons and the Argonne.

Monteux came to the United States with the Ballet Russe after being discharged to make the trip — which was considered a propaganda tour to rouse U. S. sympathy with the Allies.

Until the time of his illness last winter, Monteux was considered the dean of the world's active conductors.

He led more than 65 symphony orchestras in both Europe and the United States.

Erich Leinsdorf, present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said Monteux "knew no boundaries of nationality or epoch. Any composer could be sure that his music would be heard undisturbed and in its own glory."

"Pierre Monteux was a true blessing for music and all who love music," Leinsdorf said.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
ox 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 63,635

JUL 2 1964

Tanglewood Plans Requiem To Honor Pierre Monteux

Hancock, Maine — (UPI) — The opening program of the 1964 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., has been amended to include a memoriam to Pierre Monteux, world renowned symphony conductor, who died yesterday at his home.

A spokesman for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Mr. Monteux led from 1919 to 1924, said the Kyrie from Mozart's C Minor Mass would be added to the program tomorrow night.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, said Mr. Monteux was "a true blessing for music and all who love music.

"In my sadness over his passing is mixed profound gratitude that a kind fate kept him active longer than any other conductor and that his lucid mind stayed with him all the way," Mr. Leinsdorf said.

Funeral services will be held Saturday in St. Joseph's Catholic Church in Ellsworth.

Mr. Monteux, 89, was born in Paris and became a United States citizen in 1942. He studied violin at the Paris Conservatory and went on to become conductor of symphony orchestras in Boston and San Francisco as well as Amsterdam, Berlin, London, Paris and Vienna.

He was still conducting this spring and had planned engagements for the fall and winter season. He last appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in December.

Mrs. David Michlin, his sister, said he had been confined to his home for several months and died in his sleep.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said that although Mr. Monteux is dead "his contributions and accomplishments for the world of music will live on as long as music is played.

"For more than half a century he brought his conducting genius to many of the world's great orchestras," Mr. Cabot said.

Born in the Jewish faith, Mr. Monteux later became a Protestant and still later was converted to Catholicism.

He began his studies at the Paris Conservatory in 1892 and in 1896 was graduated with first honors in violin.

Mr. Monteux began conducting in 1911 when he founded the Concerts Berlioz and in that same year was appointed chief conductor of the Ballet Russe.

He made musical history in 1913 while conducting the world premier of the Igor Stravinsky ballet "The Rite of Spring" in Paris. The music was so modern and dissonant that an unprecedented riot developed. The conductor's other premieres included Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," and Debussy's "Jeux."

Mr. Monteux and his American wife, Doris Hodgkins Monteux, moved to Maine in 1952 when he stepped down as conductor at San Francisco.

Last month Mr. Monteux canceled two scheduled appearances at the Berkshire festival to rest for his fall and winter engagements.

Last April 2, two days before his 89th birthday, he collapsed while conducting a concert at the St. Cecelia Academy in Rome. He continued after taking a short rest.

Previously he had been stricken with a heart attack while on a Scandinavian tour.

Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra before two generations of Rhode Islanders, as its leader shortly after World War I, and later as a guest conductor.

One of the largest audiences of many seasons came to the old Infantry Hall on Nov. 18, 1919, to hear Mr. Monteux conduct the orchestra in Providence for the first time. The Providence Journal critic said the audience "applauded to the echo at its conclusion."

At his final appearance here in 1924, as leader of the Boston Symphony, he was presented with a statuette.

He returned to play in Veterans Memorial Auditorium as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1955 and 1959. The latter concert marked the 40th anniversary of his appearances in Providence, and at the age of 85, Mr. Monteux conducted entirely from memory a "very excellent" program of Brahms, Hindemith and Tschaikovsky. Conductor and program were given a sentimental and enthusiastic reception by the audience.

The Providence Journal's critic at the concert wrote:

"The importance of Pierre Monteux to orchestral directing here cannot really be measured. In addition to his long association with the Boston Symphony which goes back to 1919 in Providence, he has assisted in the training of both the director and assistant director of the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, through which his presence is continually felt."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 100,582
JUL 1 1964

Pierre Monteux Is Dead, Famed Orchestra Leader

PAGE ONE

Dies in Sleep at 89 in Home at Hancock, Me.; With Boston Symphony From 1919 to 1924

HANCOCK, Me.—French-born Pierre Monteux, who conducted more than 65 of the world's great orchestras over half a century, died in his sleep early today. He was 89.

The walrus-mustachioed conductor, a small but commanding figure on the podium, had been ill for several months. His last conducting appearance was in Rome last spring where he suffered a fall.

Monteux led the original Ballet Russe Orchestra early in his career and later conducted such renowned symphonies as Boston, San Francisco and Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam.

A believer in the quiet school of conducting, Monteux was said to have been able to "create a storm in an orchestra with a flick of his wrist."

He came to the United States with the Ballet Russe in 1916, after serving in the French army during World War I and stayed on as conductor of the French repertory of the Metropolitan Opera. He became a U. S. citizen in 1942 and had lived here with his American wife for many years.

Monteux's interest in music began at the age of six when he made life unbearable around his home in Paris until his parents let him take violin lessons.

Three years later he was admitted to the Paris Conservatory of Music, a distinction open only to youngsters of the highest musical promise, and studied with such future greats as Fritz Kreisler.

The stocky little Frenchman won instant popularity among San Franciscans in 1934, where he stayed until 1942. They fondly called him "Papa." Under his direction, the faltering San Francisco Symphony took its place among the world's finest orchestras.

He married the former Doris Hodgkins in Brussels in 1927 and they lived summers at her family homestead here, overlooking a rock-bordered tidal bay. They moved here permanently in 1952.

Even in retirement, when he was in his 80's, he was constantly being asked to guest conduct the symphonies of the world. And he usually filled the request.

Monteux preferred Brahms, Beethoven, Schumann and Wagner—in that order.

"Absolutely on the romantic side," he once said. "I don't like abstract music or abstract painting, either. Modern is all right, but not abstract."

He once told an interviewer modestly that he played only the violin and viola. His wife protested: "But he plays every instrument in the orchestra."

"Badly," added Monteux with a wink.

He was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1919 to 1924 and led the Amsterdam Orchestra for nine years.

Monteux conducted the first performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" in 1913 when it was considered revolutionary in the music world. The performance touched off riots in Paris, but Monteux insisted on introducing it. He also introduced Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" in Paris in 1912.

Erich Leinsdorf, present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said Monteux "knew no boundaries of nationality or epoch. Any composer could be sure that his music would be heard undisturbed and in its own glory."

"Pierre Monteux was a true blessing for music and all who love music," Leinsdorf said.

A mass of requiem was set for Saturday morning at 9 at St. Joseph's Church in nearby Ellsworth, with burial in Hancock.

A spokesman said the family wants no flowers and asked that any contributions go to Monteux's favorite charity, the Boy's Opportunity Farm at Gray, Me.

His sister, Mr. David Michlin, said Monteux had been confined to bed for nine weeks. He had returned in May from a European tour suffering from exhaustion.

After his return, he canceled two scheduled appearances at the Berkshire Summer Music Festival at Lenox, Mass. Monteux said he wanted to rest this summer in preparation for classes he conducted at his Hancock home, and for other fall and winter engagements.

PIERRE MONTEUX

His last appearance in his adopted homeland, the United States, was in December with the Boston Symphony. Monteux was still permanent conductor of the London Symphony when he died.

Monteux had two children—a son, Claude, now conductor of the Poughkeepsie Symphony, and a daughter, Mrs. Thomas Lanese. Both had summer homes near the Monteux year-round residence in Hancock.

Besides Mrs. Michlin, Monteux had another sister, Mrs. Meyer Davis of New York.

APITOL BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER
CLIPPINGS
CONSULATE NEW YORK
SERVICE

Albany Times-Union
July 2, 1964

Pierre Monteux

Many residents of the capital community will be personally moved by the death of Pierre Monteux, the French-born conductor who brought them such pleasure at Tanglewood summer concerts.

The great Monteux had an incredible career that spanned more than 60 active years in which he led nearly every one of the worlds outstanding orchestras. Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf said of him that he was "a true blessing for music and all who love music."

There was more to be remembered, however, than the Brahms, Beethoven and Wagner that came real under his baton. For Americans there was an indefinable appeal in the stocky little man with the walrus mustache that made him a compelling figure as he stepped to the podium.

Rest peacefully, "Papa" Monteux. Your contribution was indeed great.

TIMES-UNI

Deat

By EDGAR S. VA

The regrettable unexpected passing Monteux at Han during his sleep morning brought to rema cond caree was with jor in th world He parti missed by the p Tanglewood where scheduled to conduc of concerts by th Symphony Orchestr the festival which morrow night.

Like Hayden, he red to by his ad "Papa," since he the podion, and to bers of the Boston Orchestra, a friendl personality. His c colleagues at T have agreed to i new conducting co tribute to the geni mestro. Max Rud

Music

Loss of

Hancock, Maine, The music world m death today of Pierr the French-born whose spanned mor a century with great orchestras.

It was joined b residents of this Ma town, who knew "Pierre," as the c honorary fire chief man who had adopte as his home with a fection.

Monteux, 89, wa manent conductor don Symphony Orch he died in his slee

His sister, Mrs. lin, said Monteux concussion in a fal several months ag he returned to Ha cuperate, but suff brain hemorrages.

Members of the hestra were shoc news. They had e teux to lead their starting in Septem

The honorary p Arthur Bliss, a Monteux was a gr who devoted his music.

"Contemporary especially owe him

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 63,635
JUL 2 1964

Tanglewood Plans Requiem To Honor Pierre Monteux

Hancock, Maine — (UPI) — The opening program of the 1964 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., has been amended to include a memoriam to Pierre Monteux, world renowned symphony conductor, who died yesterday at his home.

A spokesman for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Mr. Monteux led from 1919 to 1924, said the Kyrie from Mozart's C Minor Mass would be added to the program tomorrow night.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, said Mr. Monteux was "a true blessing for music and all who love music.

"In my sadness over his passing is mixed profound gratitude that a kind fate kept him active longer than any other conductor and that his lucid mind stayed with him all the way," Mr. Leinsdorf said.

Funeral services will be held Saturday in St. Joseph's Catholic Church in Ellsworth.

Mr. Monteux, 89, was born in Paris and became a United States citizen in 1942. He studied violin at the Paris Conservatory and went on to become conductor of symphony orchestras in Boston and San Francisco as well as Amsterdam, Berlin, London, Paris and Vienna.

He was still conducting this spring and had planned engagements for the fall and winter season. He last appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in December.

Mrs. David Michlin, his sister, said he had been confined to his home for several months and died in his sleep.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said that although Mr. Monteux is dead "his contributions and accomplishments for the world of music will live on as long as music is played.

"For more than half a century he brought his conducting genius to many of the world's great orchestras," Mr. Cabot said.

Born in the Jewish faith, Mr. Monteux later became a Protestant and still later was converted to Catholicism.

He began his studies at the Paris Conservatory in 1892 and in 1896 was graduated with first honors in violin.

Mr. Monteux began conducting in 1911 when he founded the Concerts Berlioz and in that same year was appointed chief conductor of the Ballet Russe.

He made musical history in 1913 while conducting the world premier of the Igor Stravinsky ballet "The Rite of Spring" in Paris. The music was so modern and dissonant that an unprecedented riot developed. The conductor's other premieres included Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," and Debussy's "Jeux."

Mr. Monteux and his American wife, Doris Hodgkins Monteux, moved to Maine in 1952 when he stepped down as conductor at San Francisco.

Last month Mr. Monteux canceled two scheduled appearances at the Berkshire festival to rest for his fall and winter engagements.

Last April 2, two days before his 89th birthday, he collapsed while conducting a concert at the St. Cecelia Academy in Rome. He continued after taking a short rest.

Previously he had been stricken with a heart attack while on a Scandinavian tour.

Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra before two generations of Rhode Islanders, as its leader shortly after World War I, and later as a guest conductor.

One of the largest audiences of many seasons came to the old Infantry Hall on Nov. 18, 1919, to hear Mr. Monteux conduct the orchestra in Providence for the first time. The Providence Journal critic said the audience "applauded to the echo at its conclusion."

At his final appearance here in 1924, as leader of the Boston Symphony, he was presented with a statuette.

He returned to play in Veterans Memorial Auditorium as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1955 and 1959. The latter concert marked the 40th anniversary of his appearances in Providence, and at the age of 85, Mr. Monteux conducted entirely from memory a "very excellent" program of Brahms, Hindemith and Tschaikovsky. Conductor and program were given a sentimental and enthusiastic reception by the audience.

The Providence Journal's critic at the concert wrote:

"The importance of Pierre Monteux to orchestral directing here cannot really be measured. In addition to his long association with the Boston Symphony which goes back to 1919 in Providence, he has assisted in the training of both the director and assistant director of the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, through which his presence is continually felt."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 100,582
JUL 1 1964

Pierre Monteux Is Dead, Famed Orchestra Leader

PAGE ONE

Dies in Sleep at 89 in Home at Hancock, Me.; With Boston Symphony From 1919 to 1924

HANCOCK, Me.—French-born Pierre Monteux, who conducted more than 65 of the world's great orchestras over half a century, died in his sleep early today. He was 89.

The walrus-mustachioed conductor, a small but commanding figure on the podium, had been ill for several months. His last conducting appearance was in Rome last spring where he suffered a fall.

Monteux led the original Ballet Russe Orchestra early in his career and later conducted such renowned symphonies as Boston, San Francisco and Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam.

A believer in the quiet school of conducting, Monteux was said to have been able to "create a storm in an orchestra with a flick of his wrist."

He came to the United States with the Ballet Russe in 1916, after serving in the French army during World War I and stayed on as conductor of the French repertory of the Metropolitan Opera. He became a U. S. citizen in 1942 and had lived here with his American wife for many years.

Monteux's interest in music began at the age of six when he made life unbearable around his home in Paris until his parents let him take violin lessons.

Three years later he was admitted to the Paris Conservatory of Music, a distinction open only to youngsters of the highest musical promise, and studied with such future greats as Fritz Kreisler.

The stocky little Frenchman won instant popularity among San Franciscans in 1934, where he stayed until 1942. They fondly called him "Papa." Under his direction, the faltering San Francisco Symphony took its place among the world's finest orchestras.

He married the former Doris Hodgkins in Brussels in 1927 and they lived summers at her family homestead here, overlooking a rock-bordered tidal bay. They moved here permanently in 1952.

Even in retirement, when he was in his 80's, he was constantly being asked to guest conduct the symphonies of the world. And he usually filled the request.

Monteux preferred Brahms, Beethoven, Schumann and Wagner—in that order.

"Absolutely on the romantic side," he once said. "I don't like abstract music or abstract painting, either. Modern is all right, but not abstract."

He once told an interviewer modestly that he played only the violin and viola. His wife protested: "But he plays every instrument in the orchestra."

"Badly," added Monteux with a wink.

He was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1919 to 1924 and led the Amsterdam Orchestra for nine years.

Monteux conducted the first performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" in 1913 when it was considered revolutionary in the music world. The performance touched off riots in Paris, but Monteux insisted on introducing it. He also introduced Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" in Paris in 1912.

Erich Leinsdorf, present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said Monteux "knew no boundaries of nationality or epoch. Any composer could be sure that his music would be heard undisturbed and in its own glory."

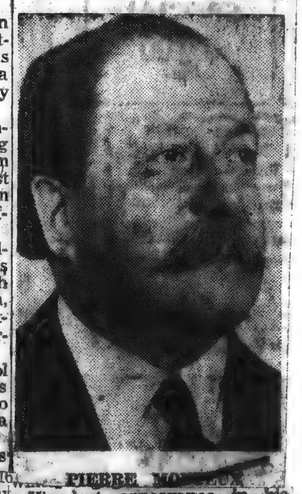
"Pierre Monteux was a true blessing for music and all who love music," Leinsdorf said.

A mass of requiem was set for Saturday morning at 9 at St. Joseph's Church in nearby Ellsworth, with burial in Hancock.

A spokesman said the family wants no flowers and asked that any contributions go to Monteux's favorite charity, the Boy's Opportunity Farm at Gray, Me.

His sister, Mrs. David Michlin, said Monteux had been confined to bed for nine weeks. He had returned in May from a European tour suffering from exhaustion.

After his return, he canceled two scheduled appearances at the Berkshire Summer Music Festival at Lenox, Mass. Monteux said he wanted to rest this summer in preparation for classes he conducted at his Hancock home, and for other fall and



PIERRE MONTEUX

His last appearance in his adopted homeland, the United States, was in December with the Boston Symphony. Monteux was still permanent conductor of the London Symphony when he died.

Monteux had two children—a son, Claude, now conductor of the Poughkeepsie Symphony, and a daughter, Mrs. Thomas Lanese. Both had summer homes near the Monteux year-round residence in Hancock.

Besides Mrs. Michlin, Monteux had another sister, Mrs. Meyer Davis of New York.

CAPITAL BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Albany Knickerbocker News
Thursday, July 2, 1964

Pierre Monteux

EDITORIAL

Many residents of the capital community will be personally moved by the death of Pierre Monteux, the French-born conductor who brought them such pleasure at Tanglewood summer concerts.

The great Monteux had an incredible career that spanned more than 60 active years in which he led nearly every one of the worlds outstanding orchestras. Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf said of him that he was "a true blessing for music and all who love music."

There was more to be remembered, however, than the Brahms, Beethoven and Wagner that came real under his baton. For Americans there was an indefinable appeal in the stocky little man with the walrus mustache that made him a compelling figure as he stepped to the podium.

Rest peacefully, "Papa" Monteux. Your contribution was indeed great.

TIMES-UNION

Death

By EDGAR S. VANO...

The regrettable but unexpected passing of ... Monteux at Hancock during his sleep ... morning brought to a ... remarkable ... conductive ... career ... was ideally ... with every ... jor orch... in the civil... world.

He ... particularly ... missed by the patrons ... Tanglewood where he ... scheduled to conduct a ... of concerts by the B... Symphony Orchestra ... the festival which open... morrow night.

Like Hayden, he was ... red to by his admir... "Papa," since he brou... the podion, and to the ... bers of the Boston Sym... Orchestra, a friendly, ... personality. His conduc... colleagues at Tang... have agreed to insti... new conducting course ... tribute to the genius ... mestro. Max Rudolf.

Music ... Loss of P...

Hancock, Maine, July ... The music world mou... death today of Pierre M... the French-born co... whose spanned more th... a century with the ... great orchestras.

It was joined by ... residents of this Ma... town, who knew ... "Pierre," as the co... honorary fire chief, ... man who had adopted ... as his home with zest ... fection.

Monteux, 89, was ... manent conductor of ... don Symphony Orche... he died in his sleep ...

His sister, Mrs. Da... lin, said Monteux ... concussion in a fall ... several months ago. ... he returned to Ma... cuperate, but suffere... brain hemorrages.

Members of the L... hestra were sho... news. They had ex... teux to lead their ... starting in Septem...

The honorary ... Arthur Bliss, ... Monteux was a ... who devoted his ... music.

"Contemporary ... especially, owe his...

TIMES-UNION Albany, Thurs., July 2, 1964

Death of 'Papa' Dims Tanglewood Season

By EDGAR S. VANOLINDA

The regrettable but not unexpected passing of Pierre Monteux at Hancock, Me. during his sleep yesterday morning brought to a close a remarkable conducting career which was identified with every major orchestra in the civilized world.

He will be particularly missed by the patrons of Tanglewood where he was scheduled to conduct a series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the festival which opens tomorrow night.

Like Hayden, he was referred to by his admirers as "Papa," since he brought to the podion, and to the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a friendly, paternal personality. His conductorial colleagues at Tanglewood have agreed to institute a new conducting course as a tribute to the genius of the mestro. Max Rudolf, music director of the Cincinnati Orchestra will be chairman.

His status symbol during his later life was his jet black hair and his white, walrus - like mustache. He was 89 years of age, alhough his approach to nonogenerianism, rested lightly on his broad shoulders. It was my privilege to have had luncheon with "Papa" Monteux a few years ago when he was appearing in concert in the local area. Quiet and unassuming in his approach to strangers, he was fully cognizant of what was taking place, and interjected humorous answers to the serious questions he was asked.

It was only last summer during an intermission in a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the occupant of an adjoining seat turned to Mrs. VanOlinda and in a spirit of friendliness, struck up an acquaintance, in which she said to the lady who goes to the theatre and concerts with me:

"Do you like Mr. Monteux?"

"Indeed I do," was my wife's reply.

"I just love him, too" said our newly found neighbor, "And do you know why? He's just my age and weighs exactly as much as I do!"

On the nights and Sunday afternoons that Mr. Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he was accorded a rousing reception at his entrance to his railed music stand. not only by the members of the audience, but with a rising gesture by the members of the orchestra, many of whom had played under him when he was the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1917 to 1919.

His musical taste was most catholic in his interpretative gifts. However, it was in the French repertory that he attained his greatest triumphs. He also revelled on the music of the Russian Ballet dating back to 1911, when Serge Diaghilev invited him to conduct the performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. His musical career began when he was a student of violin at the Paris Conservatory where he won the first prize and an engagement with the Paris Colonne Orchestra.

Mr. Monteux became an American citizen in 1942. One daughter, conducts an authentic French restaurant, near Manchester, Vt., called L'Auberge. His son, Claude, is the present conductor of the Poughkeepsie Symphony Orchestra.

Thousands of Tanglewood music lovers will miss his friendly presence this summer. When he made his theatrical entrance from the right side of the stage and waddled to the podiom, assisted by Mr. Pasquale, first violist of the Boston Symphony, there was an almost audible sigh of envy from the audience members in his age group in the large shed, that they could not match the physical vigor of little rotund, "Mr. Five-by-Five" who was endowed with such youthful joie de vivre.

AROUND THE TOWN

Pierre Monteux

Music World Mourns Loss of Pierre Monteux

Hancock, Maine, July 1 (AP)—The music world mourned the death today of Pierre Monteux, the French-born conductor whose spanned more than half a century with the world's great orchestras.

It was joined by the 800 residents of this Maine coastal town, who knew him as "Pierre," as the community's honorary fire chief, and as a man who had adopted Hancock as his home with zest and affection.

Monteux, 89, was still permanent conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra when he died in his sleep at 2 a.m.

His sister, Mrs. David Michlin, said Monteux suffered a concussion in a fall in London several months ago. She said he returned to Hancock to recuperate, but suffered several brain hemorrages.

Members of the London Orchestra were shocked at the news. They had expected Monteux to lead their world tour starting in September.

The honorary president, Sir Arthur Bliss, said, "Pierre Monteux was a great musician who devoted his whole life to music.

"Contemporary composers especially owe him a deep debt of gratitude for his magnificent support of their music."

Another spokesman said, "He enriched us both artistically and as human beings."

Monteux also once permanent conductor and often guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose present music director, Erich Leinsdorf, said of him:

"Any composer could be sure that his music would be heard undisturbed and in its own glory. Pierre Monteux was a true blessing for music and all who love music."

A Requiem Mass is planned at 9 a.m. Saturday at St. Joseph's Church in nearby Ellsworth. Burial will be in Hancock.

BLANK PAGE

MISCELLANEOUS

173

SCHOOL MUSICIAN
JOLIET, ILL.
10 Tl. a YR. 4,000

MAY 1964

This is what I learned as a Research Analyst with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during —

My Eight Weeks At Tanglewood

By RALPH R. POTTLE
Head, Department of Music
Southeastern Louisiana College
Hammond, Louisiana

(Mr. Pottle is the well known author of "Tuning The School Band and Orchestra")

Have you ever dreamed of something impossibly good happening to you and then have it happen? Have you dreamed of the time when you could spend a whole summer in the coolness of some of America's most attractive highlands, where your entire attention could be devoted to basking in the sunshine while studying music and listening to one of the world's finest symphony orchestras?

A small percentage of young Americans do enjoy such a privilege and this selective group comes from just such people as those who read this magazine. The place is Tanglewood — more officially Berkshire Music Center — located at Lenox, Massachusetts, and the music is provided both by the young people who are admitted through audition and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The 1963 season opened July 1 and closed August 25.

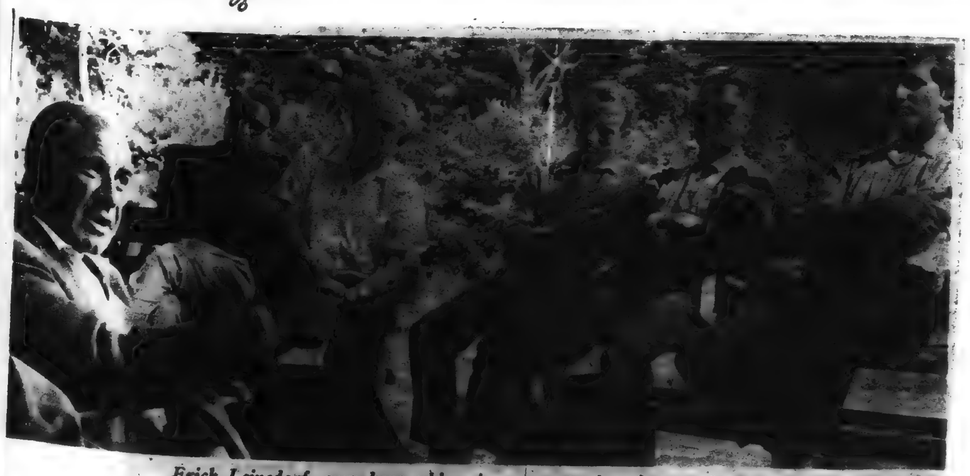
Tanglewood is a beautiful 210 acre estate which in 1936 was given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan and Mrs. Gorham Brooks. It lies in the heart of the picturesque Berkshire Hills and is marked by towering maple, pine, and cedar trees, a luxuriant growth of well kept shrubbery, and spacious green lawns. On first sight one might mistake it for an enormous country club because of its charm and beauty, but upon closer inspection one finds there a beehive of musical activity impossible to comprehend except by a former Tanglewoodian. For it is at Tanglewood — where Nathaniel

Van Cliburn rehearsing the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Eric Leinsdorf. (1963)

Close-up of Eric Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert (1963).

Herald NEW YORK Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

MAY 31 1964



Erich Leinsdorf, seen here addressing a group of student conductors at Tanglewood, leads the Boston Symphony tonight, Channel 5 at 9.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

MAY 1964

Commissions and Awards

Daniel Pinkham is currently working on four commissions. "Jubilate Deo," for three choruses and organ, commissioned by Trinity Parish, Southport, Connecticut, will be performed in June at Southport. "Stabat Mater" will be performed by the Fromm Players and Tanglewood Choir this summer at the Berkshire Music Festival. Then Sonata No. 3 for Organ and Strings will be performed at St. Andrew's Church in Wellesley, Massachusetts, for the dedication of the new organ. The Symphony No. 3, commissioned by the Portland (Marine) Symphony, conducted by Arthur Bennett Lipkin, will be played by the Portland Symphony on a Voice of America broadcast in November.

MISCELLANEOUS

173

SCHOOL MUSICIAN
JOLIET, ILL.
10 Tl. a YR. 4,000

MAY. 1964

6+2

This is what I learned as a Research Analyst with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during —

My Eight Weeks At Tanglewood

By RALPH R. POTTLE

Head, Department of Music
Southeastern Louisiana College
Hammond, Louisiana

(Mr. Pottle is the well known author of "Tuning The School Band and Orchestra")

Have you ever dreamed of something impossibly good happening to you and then have it happen? Have you dreamed of the time when you could spend a whole summer in the coolness of some of America's most attractive highlands, where your entire attention could be devoted to basking in the sunshine while studying music and listening to one of the world's finest symphony orchestras?

A small percentage of young Americans do enjoy such a privilege and this selective group comes from just such people as those who read this magazine. The place is Tanglewood — more officially Berkshire Music Center — located at Lenox, Massachusetts, and the music is provided both by the young people who are admitted through audition and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The 1963 season opened July 1 and closed August 25.

Tanglewood is a beautiful 210 acre estate which in 1936 was given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan and Mrs. Gorham Brooks. It lies in the heart of the picturesque Berkshire Hills and is marked by towering maple, pine, and cedar trees, a luxuriant growth of well kept shrubbery, and spacious green lawns. On first sight one might mistake it for an enormous country club because of its charm and beauty, but upon closer inspection one finds there a beehive of musical activity impossible to comprehend except by a former Tanglewoodian. For it is at Tanglewood — where Nathaniel

Van Cliburn rehearsing the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Eric Leinsdorf. (1963)

Close-up of Eric Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony [illegible] concert (1963).

Herald NEW YORK Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

MAY 3 1 1964

Erich Leinsdorf, seen here addressing a group of student conductors at Tanglewood, leads the Boston Symphony tonight, Channel 5 at 9.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

MAY. 1964

Commissions and Awards

Daniel Pinkham is currently working on four commissions. "Jubilate Deo," for three choruses and organ, commissioned by Trinity Parish, Southport, Connecticut, will be performed in June at Southport. "Stabat Mater" will be performed by the Fromm Players and Tanglewood Choir this summer at the Berkshire Music Festival. Then Sonata No. 3 for Organ and Strings will be performed at St. Andrew's Church in Wellesley, Massachusetts, for the dedication of the new organ. The Symphony No. 3, commissioned by the Portland (Marine) Symphony, conducted by Arthur Bennett Lipkin, will be played by the Portland Symphony on a Voice of America broadcast in November.

MISCELLANEOUS

173

Eugene Ormandy rehearses the youthful Berkshire Music Center Orchestra for a formal concert.

A typical daily scene is to see the youth String Bass Section heading for a Sectional rehearsal.

Hawthorne wrote "The House of Seven Gables," "The Wonder Book," and planned "Tanglewood Tales" — that young musicians now engage in a very serious study of music for eight weeks each summer. They come from every state in the USA and many countries of the world. Here, too, gather each summer some of the world's most renowned conductors, composers, soloists, and ensembles to assist these aspiring young musicians in attaining the full stature of their musical capabilities. Thus Tanglewood continues to function as a mainspring of inspiration for young musicians now just as it did for poets like Hawthorne, Longfellow, and Holmes in the 1850's.

As a former Tanglewood student (1949-1954-1959) I was privileged to return in 1963 as a research analyst with the Boston Symphony Orchestra while on Sabbatical leave from my college. Though the subject of my research was Tuning and Intonation I made numerous additional observations from the Great Shed atop a television platform about twelve feet above the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From this location I could see groups moving about the entire campus.

One morning I saw 34 student violinists — 18 firsts and 16 seconds — walking across the center lawn to the Great Shed for a sectional rehearsal with Joseph Silverstein, BSO Concertmaster and other BSO violinists and their noted student orchestra conductor Richard Burgin. These were followed by 14 violists, 12 cellists, and 9 string bassists, all going to different locations to be coached by other noted BSO members — Joseph DePasquale, solo violist, Samuel Mayes, solo cellist, and George Moleux, Principal bass. Likewise, wind and percussion members of the Berkshire Student Orchestra were coached by first chair players in the BSO — flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, oboist Ralph Gomberg, clarinetists Gino Cioffi and Rosario Mazzeo, bassoonist Sherman Walt, hornist James Stagliano, trumpeter Roger Voisin, trombonist William Gibson, tuba K. Vinal Smith, timpanist Everett Firth, and harpist Bernard Zinghera. Student orchestra members also worked and gave concerts under famous visiting conductors such as Eugene Ormandy, Charles Munch and BSO's own colorful conductor Eric Leinsdorf. And when these youngsters gave their weekly Wednesday evening concerts they weren't kidding — they played professional music in a professional manner. Their first program given July 10 conducted by Richard Burgin included the Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" by Berlioz, Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for double stringed orchestra, and the Second Symphony by Brahms.

First Trumpet Roger Voisin (left) and First Trombone William Gibson (right) of the BSO hearing an audition.

Eric Leinsdorf demands and gets exacting interpretation from the Boston Symphony Orchestra whether in concert or rehearsal.

Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

MAY 31 1964

Erich Leinsdorf, seen here addressing a group of student conductors at Tanglewood, leads the Boston Symphony tonight, Channel 5 at 9.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

MAY 1964

Commissions and Awards

Daniel Pinkham is currently working on four commissions. "Jubilate Deo," for three choruses and organ, commissioned by Trinity Parish, Southport, Connecticut, will be performed in June at Southport. "Stabat Mater" will be performed by the Fromm Players and Tanglewood Choir this summer at the Berkshire Music Festival. Then Sonata No. 3 for Organ and Strings will be performed at St. Andrew's Church in Wellesley, Massachusetts, for the dedication of the new organ. The Symphony No. 3, commissioned by the Portland (Marine) Symphony, conducted by Arthur Bennett Lipkin, will be played by the Portland Symphony on a Voice of America broadcast in November.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

MAY 1964

The Year-round

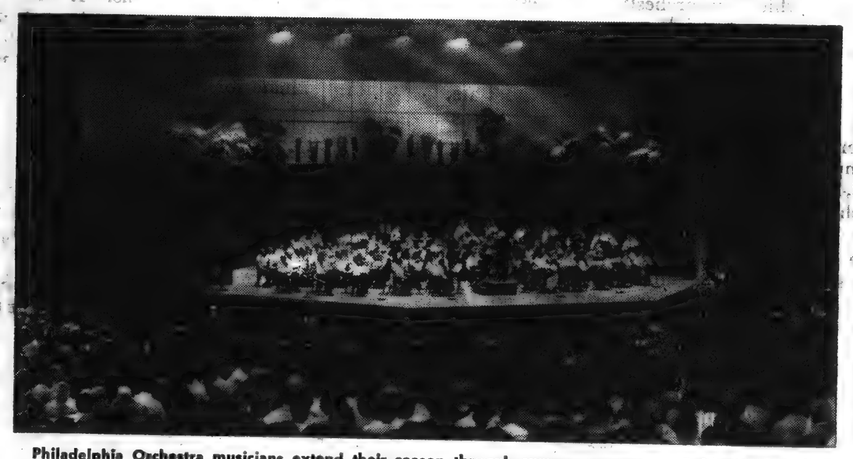
It is obvious that the surest way to give stability to our orchestral life and financial security to orchestral players is to extend the seasons of the orchestras. The movement is already under way. The symphony orchestras of Chicago, Detroit, Los Angeles, Minneapolis, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and St. Louis have all contracted in the past few years to extend their seasons.

Some orchestras are already close to being year-round functioning units. By 1965-66 the Philadelphia Orchestra will have virtually a year-round season. The Boston, counting its Berkshire and Esplanade commitments, already has fifty payroll weeks.

This all does not mean that the concerts in such-and-such an auditorium go on unvaryingly winter into spring, summer into autumn. City residents, as they are now constituted, wouldn't attend concerts in unvarying routine, even if they were presented free. Both in the United States and in Canada we are a seasonal people, oriented to different doings in different seasons of the year.

The Boston Symphony Association, for instance, has seen to it that although the members do keep employed for the fifty weeks, the orchestra does not function as such the year round. The Boston Symphony's regular symphony season is followed by its season of "The Pops"—this with the concert hall refurbished and refurnished, with tables, chairs, drinks and snacks added—all directly aimed at producing an effect of change.

On the conclusion of "The Pops," eighty of the Boston Symphony musicians move out of the concert hall to perform out-of-doors in a series called the Esplanade Concerts. These concerts are independently managed, and play to a great extent to a different audience. The remaining twenty-two or so players who do not play this series go to make up the chamber music concerts at Tanglewood and serve as faculty members for the Berkshire Music Center. After the final Esplanade Concert, the Boston Symphony musicians combine again as a full orchestra but move right out of Boston, to take up quarters at the Berkshire Music Festival. The continuity, in a word, is not in the concert season but in the occupation of the men. So does it work to the good of all concerned. Bostonians — successively enjoying the "regular" series, then sipping drinks at the pops, taking an evening off to sit on the river bank and enjoy the Esplanade Concerts, motoring up to the Berkshire Festival over a weekend—do so with the sense of partaking in seasonal festivities, events outside the usual run.



Philadelphia Orchestra musicians extend their season through summer concerts at Robin Hood Dell.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

MAY 1964

The Boston Symphony, the oldest major orchestra to have its own summer home—the 6,000-seat Music Shed on the 210-acre estate at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts—will present twenty-four concerts during the forthcoming eight-week Berkshire Festival, July 3 to August 23. Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the six chamber orchestra programs (the first two weekends), and nine of the eighteen full orchestra programs. Guest conductors will be Richard Burgin, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Max Rudolf, William Steinberg and Leopold Stokowski. This is the twenty-ninth season of the festival.

The Berkshire Festival, the Aspen Music Festival in Colorado includes a school of music as well as a concert season.

Berkshire Music Shed—summer home of the Boston Symphony

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 333,536 S. 377,788

MAY 31 1964

SCANNING the Arts

MAJOR AMERICAN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS are, and have been for some years now, in a state of turmoil. Musicians have gone on strike. Members of one orchestra actually sued their own union local for not taking their wishes into consideration while bargaining with management. In some cases, contract negotiations have been stalled until after seasons were supposed to begin, and the Detroit Symphony was forced to suspend operations for two years because of insufficient financial support. The present difficulties which beset the Kansas City Philharmonic and its players must be viewed as part of a nationwide movement among orchestral musicians to catch up with the runaway cost of living and to increase the length of their working seasons.

Here as elsewhere, the orchestra management and the citizens who support the orchestra are sympathetic. Were it within their power they would raise salaries and lengthen seasons to a far greater extent than the players have asked. The catch is that they simply do not know where the money will come from.

Perhaps some readers are not fully aware of how symphony orchestras are financed. There are no orchestras—no, not even the ones in New York, Philadelphia or Chicago—that earn enough through ticket sales to support themselves. If admittance prices were raised high enough to do this, attendance would fall off and concerts would be far beyond the means of all but the most affluent music lovers.

BEFORE THE ADVENT of the graduated income tax, the costs of running orchestras were paid by a relatively few individuals who had an interest in the arts and enough free capital to support them. A perfect example was Henry Lee Higginson, who founded the Boston Symphony in 1881 and maintained it almost single-handedly until 1918. Such a thing no longer is possible. Supplementary income has had to come from many donors instead of a few and, in recent years, the number of corporate gifts has been on the increase.

Until recently contract negotiations between orchestras and their musicians were rather cut and dried proceedings. The sponsoring organization would estimates how much it could hope to raise over its annual ticket sales income and the players generally would accept the best offer they could get.

UP THROUGH THE SEASON just ended, no American orchestra had been able to offer its musicians a year-round contract. The closest any of them came to this ideal was in Boston, where most of the players are employed for 48 weeks. The shortest 1963-64 season of any major orchestra (those having annual budgets of more than $250,000) was in Denver where the musicians were contracted for 20 weeks. Between these extremes were about 20 symphonies with an average season length of about 31 weeks.

It is not easy to pinpoint where and when the attitude of the musicians began to stiffen. The players in the Cleveland Symphony hauled the officers of their union local into court about five years ago after the union settled on terms that the musicians deemed inadequate. Though they lost their case, the action started a national trend whereby most contracts are now submitted to the players for ratification before they become effective.

[illegible] has been inaugurated whereby members of all orchestras are kept informed of progress made in specific instances. Significant advances have been registered in several orchestras—New York, Philadelphia and Cleveland are about to begin 52-week operations, and symphonies in Los Angeles, Pittsburgh, Dallas and St. Louis have expanded their seasons substantially—and musicians everywhere are aware of it.

THE NATIONAL SYMPHONY in Washington has been engaged in two bitter disputes during the last year. Negotiations for a 1963-64 contract were so protracted that the season started two and one-half weeks late. During the season, some of the musicians who had been active in the talks were notified that their services would be terminated. This precipitated a 5-week mid-season strike which was not settled until the orchestra management agreed to submit all future firings to a committee of orchestra members.

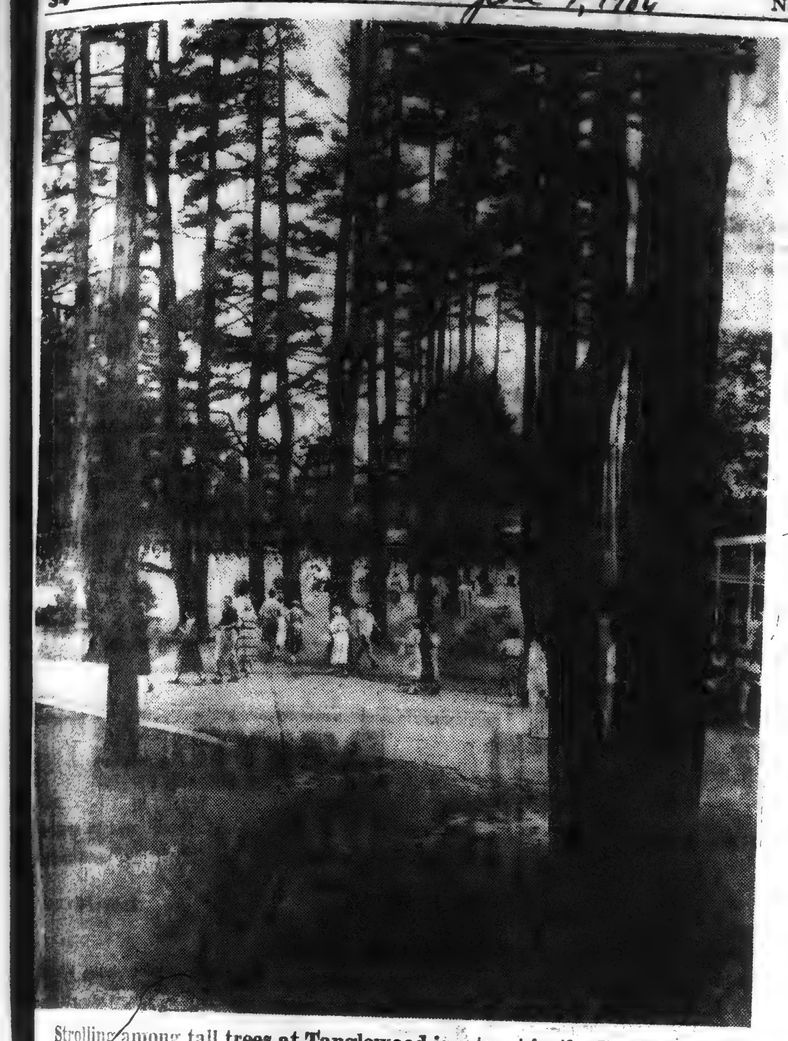
The musicians in our own Philharmonic have watched these developments and those that have taken place in other orchestras and decided to demand a longer season for 1964-65. Their belief is that by having worked short seasons at below-average salaries (the 1963-64 contract called for 23 weeks at a minimum wage of $105 a week), they have been subsidizing the orchestra for years. Some of them have told me quite bluntly that unless the community exhibits, in terms of hard cash, a greater desire to have an orchestra, it cannot expect to retain one.

SPEAKING TO THE ANNUAL MEETING of the Kansas City Philharmonic association Tuesday night, W. Howard Adams, chairman of the Missouri governor's committee on the arts, said:

"We support in this country what we think important and what we consider essential to making our society better. By your long, selfless efforts, you have firmly demonstrated that the world of serious music is one of our most essential ingredients in the pursuit of happiness. Without actively exploring every single avenue of public as well as private resources in this fateful enterprise, we could well see the arts slip into a long dark age from which they might never recover."

The citizens who make up the Philharmonic association have done everything that can be expected of them—and more—to make the orchestra a viable part of the community's life pattern. It is time for the rest of Greater Kansas City to wake up to the imminent danger of losing its orchestra, and with it one of the decisive factors that go into the making of a major city.

Sandor Kallai



Strolling among tall trees at Tanglewood is a treat in the Berkshires.

Cultural

By FRANK PRIAL
Of the World-Telegram Staff

If any one man can be credited with making the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts the popular vacation area it is today, he is the late Serge Koussevitsky, the great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was Koussevitsky who founded the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, near Lenox, and it was he who transformed the festival from an isolated, academic affair into an important musical season, attracting thousands of visitors to the area every summer.

Tanglewood's success encouraged others. Now, visitors to the Berkshires may choose from a variety of cultural events including Ted Shawn's Dance Festival, the Lenox Jazz Festival, theaters at Stockbridge and Williamstown, and art shows everywhere, from May through October.

* * *

By sheer weight of music professionalism, the school festival idea reaches its peak in the festivals at Aspen, Colorado—an institute so broadly based as to encompass the study of all the humanities, and the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Massachusetts, the summer home of the Boston Symphony. Presenting artists of national and international stature, some of whom remain in residence to teach, these schools and festivals attract students and audiences from great distances. This year, in addition to the Festival Orchestra under Walter Susskind, Aspen's nine weeks of concerts will present a host of musicians and singers in a wide range of programs of chamber works, recitals, operas, and seldom-heard compositions including works by composers-in-residence such as Darius Milhaud. At Tanglewood, in a season stretching from the end of June to August 23, a roster of great conductors is scheduled: Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony's music director and present guiding force of the Berkshire Music Center, leading off such revered conductors as Stokowski, Monteux, and Ormandy. Although they dominate the Festival, the performances of the Boston Symphony are by no means the limit of the scope of musical events at Tanglewood; the chamber music series, the festival of contemporary American music, concerts by the Boston "Pops," and open rehearsals of the Boston Symphony are all ample reasons why tourists and festival fans flock to the Berkshire Hills each summer—some to take up temporary residence in the surrounding area.

NewYorkWorld-Telegram and The Sun
D. 423,849 SAT. 142,176
JUN 9 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
JUN 14 1964

Targets for Teachers Public and Private

By R. C. HAMMERICH

A roundabout and disorganized sequence of thoughts has le us from the sudden awareness of the simultaneous suspension o private and public music lessons for the summer to a contempla tion of two serious flaws in the music lesson business — publi and private, one each.

The flaws are, more or less, a result of the condition that produces the virtues; so correction can't be easy.

Different Aspects

In emphasizing different aspects of music study, the two systems complement each other nicely, but both are oriented entirely toward the performer to the exclusion of the listener—and therein lie the flaws.

The public system has made great strides in the last couple of dozen years. Every child is given opportunity to learn to play an instrument (portable).

He is tested to see whether he can blow a horn easier than he can a reed (clarinet) or a whistle (flute) and his sense of pitch is evaluated to see if he can handle the difficult intonation of a string instrument.

He is offered the use of an instrument at low rental, given lessons and, most important, is given opportunity to perform in ensembles as long as he wishes.

Tend to Neglect

But although the public system eargerly teaches all who wish to sing or play an instrument, it tends to neglect the listeners—the audience.

And let it be noted carefuly that a performer is not necessarily a discriminating listener. Many musicians know little about the music they play and are astonishingly ignorant about music outside the scope of their specialty. There is too much to know, and they don't have time. The public system teaches readers a lot about the literature of language; it doesn't teach listeners much about the literature of music.

Recital Career

The advantage in the private system, of course, is in special, concentrated, tutorial methods that augment the school's group system.

It does not usually offer ensemble experience, but it can help prepare performers for recital careers—a process which can lead to trouble.

Private teachers lucky enough to have a student of exceptional talent frequently develop their own dreams of reflected glory. They set their student's sights on a career as a celebrated soloist and conduct an intensive training regime toward that goal.

What happend to many such students is illustrated by a story told sadly by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

They appear when Boston's "aristocrat of orchestras" advertises auditions to fill vacancies in the orchestra. They are thoroughly prepared, says Leinsdorf, to play from memory the solo parts for three or four virtuoso concertos, and what's more, to play them very well.

When, however, they are given music to play at sight, they falter.

Unfortunately, says Leinsdorf, soloists who know by heart the subtleties of every note in the solo part of a few concertos are not what the orchestra needs.

It must be able to play at sight nearly anything put before it so that rehearsal time can be spent on matters such as style. Musicians who have not been trained in sight reading and ensemble playing cannot do the work.

Thus we have large needs in musical education, neither of which will be easy to satisfy:

General instruction in basic musical evaluation for listeners.

Continuation among private students of group-performance techniques learned in school.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 448,810
JUN 14 1964

175

MEET BILL PIERCE

Symphony and He Make Pleasant Music

By Jane Clancy

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra performances on WGBH-TV, Channel 2, have a devoted audience of thousands to whom William Pierce is an indispensable part of the proceedings.

After seven years as the Symphony's announcer on television and 10 years in the same role on radio, he is as closely associated with the concerts as the music itself.

New Englanders abroad have written to tell him they recognized his voice on Boston Symphony concerts broadcast by the Voice of America.

Bill Pierce, a New Bedford native, is a graduate of Bowdoin College and taught at Westminster School in Simsbury, Conn., for a year before becoming staff announcer and newsman for station WNBH in New Bedford. From there he went to Worcester and then to Brockton as program director at WBKA. In 1952 he joined WGBH-FM as a staff announcer, and in 1957 also took on television announcing duties at Channel 2.

BILL PIERCE

Bill has spent the last five summers in Lenox announcing for the Berkshire Music Festival concerts recorded at Tanglewood for delayed national and international broadcasts.

Working on special program series is Bill's favorite challenge to his ability as artistic interpreter. Last year Channel 2 took viewers "Inside Symphony Hall" at intermission time, and Bill interviewed persons vitally connected with the Symphony, among them conductor Arthur Fiedler, composers whose works were being presented, artists who would perform at the concerts, Symphony manager Thomas D. Perry, Jr., and Edward Charon who runs Symphony Hall.

★

Bill often receives letters from listeners complimenting him on his work, and he tries to answer every one of them.

"It's very flattering to have people take the time to write when they're pleased. I have a theory about announcing—you're invited into someone's home when they turn the dial, and you shouldn't yell at them."

Mornings, Bill tutors children suffering from specific language disabilities, a neurological disorder which causes them to substitute one word for another—cat for that, or hat for bat.

Six years ago Bill bought a 200-year-old house in Hingham which has turned him into a part-time gardener and furniture refinisher.

He does have the air and manner of a man thoroughly content in his work. One might even venture to note he's completely in tune with his chosen career.

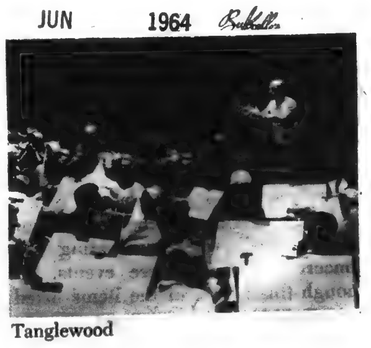
Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 32,009
JUN 30 1964

Tanglewood's Tangled Traffic

BERKSHIRE EAGLE, PITTSFIELD, MASS.

COMPLAINTS BY WEST Street residents in Lenox about the heavy Tanglewood traffic are thoroughly understandable, for concert-goers every summer make a West Side highway out of what is normally a quiet residential street. But solving the problem is no easy matter, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra management and local officials know from efforts in the past. The only sure way would be to pick up Tanglewood and set it down near the new bypass.

INSTRUMENTALIST
EAVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 15,000
JUN 1964



Tanglewood

Strolling among tall trees at Tanglewood is a treat in the Berkshires.

Cultural

By FRANK PRIAL
Of the World-Telegram Staff

If any one man can be credited with making the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts the popular vacation area it is today, he is the late Serge Koussevitsky, the great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was Koussevitsky who founded the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, near Lenox, and it was he who transformed the festival from an isolated, academic affair into an important musical season, attracting thousands of visitors to the area every summer.

Tanglewood's success encouraged others. Now, visitors to the Berkshires may choose from a variety of cultural events including Ted Shawn's Dance Festival, the Lenox Jazz Festival, theaters at Stockbridge and Williamstown, and art shows everywhere, from May through October.

* * *

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 423,849 SAT. 142,176
JUN 9 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 448,810
JUN 14 1964

175

MEET BILL PIERCE

Symphony and He Make Pleasant Music

By Jane Clancy

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra performances on WGBH-TV, Channel 2, have a devoted audience of thousands to whom William Pierce is an indispensable part of the proceedings.

After seven years as the Symphony's announcer on television and 10 years in the same role on radio, he is as closely associated with the concerts as the music itself.

New Englanders abroad have written to tell him they recognized his voice on Boston Symphony concerts broadcast by the Voice of America.

Bill Pierce, a New Bedford native, is a graduate of Bowdoin College and taught at Westminster School in Simsbury, Conn., for a year before becoming staff announcer and newsman for station WNBH in New Bedford. From there he went to Worcester and then to Brockton as program director at WBKA. In 1952 he joined WGBH-FM as a staff announcer, and in 1957 also took on television announcing duties at Channel 2.

BILL PIERCE

Bill has spent the last five summers in Lenox announcing for the Berkshire Music Festival concerts recorded at Tanglewood for delayed national and international broadcasts.

Working on special program series is Bill's favorite challenge to his ability as artistic interpreter. Last year Channel 2 took viewers "Inside Symphony Hall" at intermission time, and Bill interviewed persons vitally connected with the Symphony, among them conductor Arthur Fiedler, composers whose works were being presented, artists who would perform at the concerts, Symphony manager Thomas D. Perry, Jr., and Edward Charon who runs Symphony Hall.

★

Bill often receives letters from listeners complimenting him on his work, and he tries to answer every one of them.

"It's very flattering to have people take the time to write when they're pleased. I have a theory about announcing—you're invited into someone's home when they turn the dial, and you shouldn't yell at them."

Mornings, Bill tutors children suffering from specific language disabilities, a neurological disorder which causes them to substitute one word for another—cat for that, or hat for bat.

Six years ago Bill bought a 200-year-old house in Hingham which has turned him into a part-time gardener and furniture refinisher.

He does have the air and manner of a man thoroughly content in his work. One might even venture to note he's completely in tune with his chosen career.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
JUN 14 1964

Targets for Teachers Public and Private

By R. C. HAMMERICH

A roundabout and disorganized sequence of thoughts has le us from the sudden awareness of the simultaneous suspension o private and public music lessons for the summer to a contempla tion of two serious flaws in the music lesson business — publi and private, one each.

The flaws are, more or less, a result of the condition that produces the virtues; so correction can't be easy.

Different Aspects

In emphasizing different aspects of music study, the two systems complement each other nicely, but both are oriented entirely toward the performer to the exclusion of the listener—and therein lie the flaws.

The public system has made great strides in the last couple of dozen years. Every child is given opportunity to learn to play an instrument (portable).

He is tested to see whether he can blow a horn easier than he can a reed (clarinet) or a whistle (flute) and his sense of pitch is evaluated to see if he can handle the difficult intonation of a string instrument.

He is offered the use of an instrument at low rental, given lessons and, most important, is given opportunity to perform in ensembles as long as he wishes.

Tend to Neglect

But although the public system eargerly teaches all who wish to sing or play an instrument, it tends to neglect the listeners—the audience.

And let it be noted carefully that a performer is not necessarily a discriminating listener. Many musicians know little about the music they play and are astonishingly ignorant about music outside the scope of their specialty. There is too much to know, and they don't have time.

The public system teaches readers a lot about the literature of language; it doesn't teach listeners much about the literature of music.

Recital Career

The advantage in the private system, of course, is in special, concentrated, tutorial methods that augment the school's group system.

It does not usually offer ensemble experience, but it can help prepare performers for recital careers—a process which can lead to trouble.

Private teachers lucky enough to have a student of exceptional talent frequently develop their own dreams of reflected glory. They set their student's sights on a career as a celebrated soloist and conduct an intensive training regime toward that goal.

What happend to many such students is illustrated by a story told sadly by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

They appear when Boston's "aristocrat of orchestras" advertises auditions to fill vacancies in the orchestra. They are thoroughly prepared, says Leinsdorf, to play from memory the solo parts for three or four virtuoso concertos, and what's more, to play them very well.

When, however, they are given music to play at sight, they falter.

Unfortunately, says Leinsdorf, soloists who know by heart the subtleties of every note in the solo part of a few concertos are not what the orchestra needs.

It must be able to play at sight nearly anything put before it so that rehearsal time can be spent on matters such as style. Musicians who have not been trained in sight reading and ensemble playing cannot do the work.

Thus we have large needs in musical education, neither of which will be easy to satisfy:

General instruction in basic musical evaluation for listeners.

Continuation among private students of group performance techniques learned in school.

By sheer weight of music professionalism, the school festival idea reaches its peak in the festivals at Aspen, Colorado—an institute so broadly based as to encompass the study of all the humanities, and the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Massachusetts, the summer home of the Boston Symphony. Presenting artists of national and international stature, some of whom remain in-residence to teach, these schools and festivals attract students and audiences from great distances. This year, in addition to the Festival Orchestra under Walter Susskind, Aspen's nine weeks of concerts will present a host of musicians and singers in a wide range of programs of chamber works, recitals, operas, and seldom-heard compositions including works by composers-in-residence such as Darius Milhaud. At Tanglewood, in a season stretching from the end of June to August 23, a roster of great conductors is scheduled: Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony's music director and present guiding force of the Berkshire Music Center, leading off such revered conductors as Stokowski, Monteux, and Ormandy. Although they dominate the Festival, the performances of the Boston Symphony are by no means the limit of the scope of musical events at Tanglewood; the chamber music series, the festival of contemporary American music, concerts by the Boston "Pops," and open rehearsals of the Boston Symphony are all ample reasons why tourists and festival fans flock to the Berkshire Hills each summer—some to take up temporary residence in the surrounding area.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 32,009
JUN 30 1964

Tanglewood's Tangled Traffic

BERKSHIRE EAGLE, PITTSFIELD, MASS.

COMPLAINTS BY WEST Street residents in Lenox about the heavy Tanglewood traffic are thoroughly understandable, for concert-goers every summer make a West Side highway out of what is normally a quiet residential street. But solving the problem is no easy matter; as the Boston Symphony Orchestra management and local officials know from efforts in the past. The only sure way would be to pick up Tanglewood and set it down near the new bypass.

INSTRUMENTALIST
EAVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 15,000
JUN 1964

Tanglewood

176

The Oregonian
PORTLAND, OREGON
D. 210,307 SUN. 336,753

JUN 2 8 1964

Portland To Make Majors With Well-Paid Symphony

BY HILMAR GRONDAHL
Music Editor, The Oregonian

While Herman Kenin was here presiding over the convention of the American Federation he left with us a tabulation of the wage scales and working conditions of 24 American Symphony orchestras which were represented at the AFM 1963 symposium.

Two of the orchestras were Canadian; the Montreal and Toronto, the rest are ensembles in the United States.

These 22 are considered the country's major symphonies. The definition of "major" a few years ago was an orchestra with a budget in excess of $25,000 and an arrangement whereby players work and are paid on a weekly basis. The basic budgetary figure has since been raised to $500,000, but those who were in the classification before the raise are still permitted to be called "major" although their budgets are below the new designation.

Boston Most Expensive

The most expensive orchestra in the country is the Boston Symphony which has an annual budget of $2,500,000. The New York Philharmonic is second with a $2,000,000 followed by the Philadelphia Orchestra with $1,700,000, Chicago with $1,300,000 and Los Angeles with a cool $1,000,000.

Boston's big budget does not guarantee the biggest salary for its players. Its $185 per week is exceeded by New York and Philadelphia with $200 each and Chicago with the highest weekly salary of $210.

In the number of its players Boston is again at the top of the list with 107. New York and Philadelphia tie again with 106 each followed by Chicago and 103.

The country's four top orchestras are big business, operating virtually the year round at weekly salaries which provide an acceptable security to their members. Beside the pay scale there are fringe benefits which include social security, paid sick leave, a pension plan, paid vacation, etc.

Of course some of these same benefits are provided by orchestras whose budgets and weekly salaries are only fractional in comparison with the top four.

The average number of weeks in its concert season among the remaining 18 orchestras in the so-called major classification is 28 weeks. Portland's new season will be 26 weeks long, not counting any summer concerts.

Concerts in Pairs

The number of weeks an orchestra plays does not always indicate the number of concerts it gives. For example, the Seattle Symphony with a 28 week season, and rated among the majors because of its half-million budget and weekly pay contract, plays its concerts in pairs.

Portland's basic membership of 90 players compares favorably with the 88 in Seattle and six of the other so-called major symphonies.

The local orchestra pays its players on a per-service basis. While the contract calls for 72 services the number last year totaled 106.

Dividing the average seasonal income by the number of weeks in the season one comes up with a weekly salary of approximately $70. While this is below the average of the minor "majors" it compares favorably with that of Denver, which has fewer musicians and a shorter season.

Obviously Portland is not far from joining the major leagues.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 41,075

JUL 1 1 1964

Don't Take Little Tots To Concerts

Lenox, Mass.—In order to provide the necessary concert decorum at the Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center performances at Tanglewood, the administration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra asked parents and camp directors to preserve the quiet found in any concert hall.

While the activities at Tanglewood are intended primarily for adult audiences, properly supervised children and young people who are prepared to enjoy and listen to the music are welcome. Infants and children not yet ready to enjoy the concerts are discouraged from attending.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, stated in a letter to camp managements:

"Being a father of five I know that vitality and exuberance are exactly what we look for in our youngsters. We, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, want more than anything else to have the enthusiasm, affection, and interest of the young.

"Thus we welcome to Tanglewood the children who are prepared to listen, and we hope that the parents will bring them, and that the camp managements will lead them to our appropriate offerings as often as possible.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 1964

"Under The Stars" at Tanglewood

1964 is the 30th anniversary of the late Dr. Henry Hadley, noted conductor-composer's dream to give concerts in the Berkshires "Under the Moon." Few people remember that the first Berkshire Festival came from this gentleman. Dr. Hadley lifted his eyes into the Berkshire Hills.

Dr. Hadley told an "angel," the late renowned Gertrude Robinson Smith, his dream. Everyone in the Berkshires remembers her dynamic personality. Dr. Hadley brought the first orchestra—65—chosen from the New York Philharmonic Society, to perform for the first Berkshire Festival Concert on Aug. 23, 1934. This was given in the fields on the Dan Hanna estate. There were 3000 present—quite different from the 12,500 attending a concert today.

In 1936 the Berkshire Symphony Inc. felt a real need for a permanent orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, musical director, and George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, accepted the call. They were agreed on giving concerts in the Berkshires with a permanent orchestra of 80 members.

In 1937 came the gift from Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan and Mrs. Gorham Brooks of their 200 acre estate. The formal gardens, beautiful trees and a heavenly view overlooking the Stockbridge Bowl lake, make it unique.

You all know the fabulous legends of Dr[illegible] zky and his dream of a Music Student [illegible] came true and he will be remembered. W[illegible] Dr. Charles Muench carried on as music Summer concerts.

Today a marvelous new era has begun at [illegible] Leinsdorf, the present Boston Symphony [illegible] director has great dreams—not only for t[illegible] but for the academy. He wishes the youth [illegible] to none in the world. In the short time he [illegible] us wonderful things have been accomplished Tanglewood will live forever in these Spr[illegible] Hills. We, of the Berkshires extend greetings and best wishes to Erich Leinsdorf, our musical director, Thomas Perry Jr., splendid manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all the fine people associated at Tanglewood.

Do come to the Berkshire Festival June 30 to Aug. 2, 1964.

JANICE CLARKSON CLEWORTH
Melody Farm (Stockbridge, Mass.)

NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK SERVICE

Today's Opinions

Pierre Monteax

"Retire? Is that an English word I have not yet learned?"

Thus Pierre Monteux quipped with a reporter when asked what he intended to do after leaving his post as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, a position he held for 16 years.

And that was 13 years ago.

Monteux never retired. He conducted his last concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last December. He had agreed to conduct his 90th anniversary concert in Boston on April 4, 1965. He conducted the final concert of his career in Rome last April.

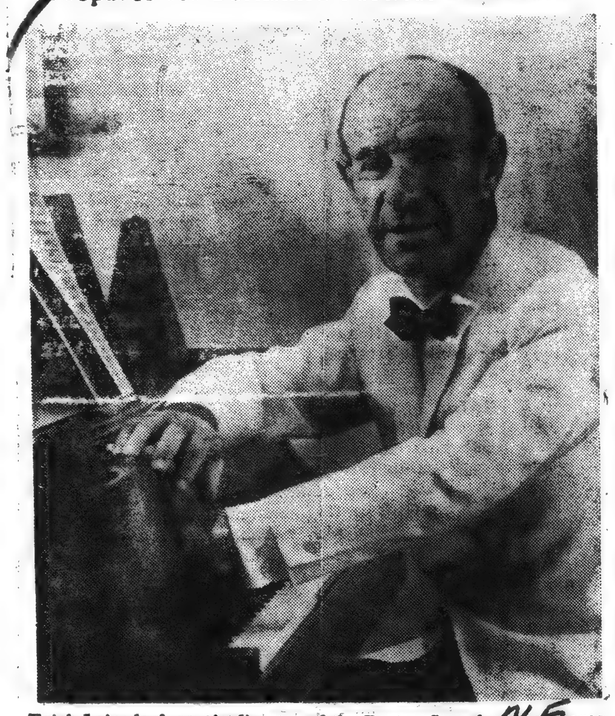
Musically his place in 20th-century music will be preserved through his many excellent recordings. Historically, however, he will remain one of the giants of our time. It was he who conducted the unforgettable world premiere of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" back in 1913. He was also on hand to guide the first performances of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

Though his name will be linked forever with these masterworks, Monteux's greatest triumph was his joyous activity through his fruitful career. The word retire was just not in his vocabulary.

—Christian Science Monitor

NEWS BUREAU
N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
NEW YORK SERVICE

Prepares for Berkshire Festival Broadcasts



Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, prepares programs for the Orchestra's annual summer move to Tanglewood, Mass., for Berkshire Festival concerts. They will be heard, beginning in mid-July, on WBEN-FM (102.5 mc) Wednesday nights from 8 to 10 o'clock, and on WBEN-Radio (930 kw) Saturdays at 8:30 PM.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Bee
NEWTOWN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,248

JUL 1 0 1964

The administration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is inviting the cooperation of parents and camp directors in preserving the quiet found in any concert hall. While the activities at Tanglewood are intended primarily for adult audiences, properly supervised children and young people who are prepared to enjoy and listen to the music are welcome. Camps intending to send groups to any program at Tanglewood are asked to telephone Norman S. Shirk, assistant manager of the orchestra, at Lenox 637-1600 several days in advance of the expected visit.

176

The Oregonian
PORTLAND, OREGON
D. 216,367 SUN. 356,753

JUN 2 8 1964

Portland To Make Majors With Well-Paid Symphony

BY HILMAR GRONDAHL
Music Editor, The Oregonian

While Herman Kenin was here presiding over the convention of the American Federation, he left with us a tabulation of the wage scales and working conditions of 24 American Symphony orchestras which were represented at the AFM 1963 symposium.

Two of the orchestras were Canadian; the Montreal and Toronto, the rest are ensembles in the United States.

These 22 are considered the country's major symphonies. The definition of "major" a few years ago was an orchestra with a budget in excess of $25,000 and an arrangement whereby players work and are paid on a weekly basis. The basic budgetary figure has since been raised to $500,000, but those who were in the classification before the raise are still permitted to be called "major" although their budgets are below the new designation.

Boston Most Expensive

The most expensive orchestra in the country is the Boston Symphony which has an annual budget of $2,500,000. The New York Philharmonic is second with a $2,000,000 followed by the Philadelphia Orchestra with $1,700,000; Chicago with $1,300,000 and Los Angeles with a cool $1,000,000.

Boston's big budget does not guarantee the highest salary for its players. Its $185 per week is exceeded by New York and Philadelphia with $200 each and Chicago with the highest weekly salary of $210.

In the number of its players Boston is again at the top of the list with 107. New York and Philadelphia tie again with 106 each followed by Chicago and 103.

The country's four top orchestras are big business operating virtually the year round at weekly salaries which provide an acceptable security to their members. Beside the pay scale there are fringe benefits which include social security, paid sick leave, a pension plan, paid vacation, etc.

Of course some of these same benefits are provided by orchestras whose budgets and weekly salaries are only fractional in comparison with the top four.

The average number of weeks in its concert season among the remaining 18 orchestras in the so-called major classification is 28 weeks. Portland's new season will be 26 weeks long, not counting any summer concerts.

Concerts in Pairs

The number of weeks an orchestra plays does not always indicate the number of concerts it gives. For example, the Seattle Symphony with a 28 week season, ranked among the majors because of its half-million budget and weekly pay contract plays its concerts in pairs.

Portland's basic membership of 80 players compares favorably with the 83 in Seattle and six of the other so-called major symphonies.

The local orchestra pays its players on a per-service basis. While the contract calls for 72 services the number last year totaled 106.

Dividing the average seasonal income by the number of weeks in the season one comes up with a weekly salary of approximately $70. While this is below the average of the minor "majors" it compares favorably with that of Denver, which has fewer musicians and a shorter season.

Obviously Portland is not far from joining the major ranks.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 1964

"Under The Stars" at Tanglewood

1964 is the 30th anniversary of the late Dr. Henry Hadley, noted conductor-composer's dream to give concerts in the Berkshires "Under the Moon." Few people remember that the first Berkshire Festival came from this gentleman. Dr. Hadley lifted his eyes into the Berkshire Hills.

Dr. Hadley told an "angel," the late renowned Gertrude Robinson Smith, his dream. Everyone in the Berkshires remembers her dynamic personality. Dr. Hadley brought the first orchestra—65 chosen from the New York Philharmonic Society, to perform for the first Berkshire Festival Concert on Aug. 23, 1934. This was given in the fields on the Dan Hanna estate. There were 3000 present—quite different from the 12,500 attending a concert today.

In 1936 the Berkshire Symphony Inc. felt a real need for a permanent orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, musical director, and George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, accepted the call. They were agreed on giving concerts in the Berkshires with a permanent orchestra of 80 members.

In 1937 came the gift from Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan and Mrs. Gorham Brooks of their 200 acre estate. The formal gardens, beautiful trees and a heavenly view overlooking the Stockbridge Bowl lake, make it unique.

You all know the fabulous legends of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his dream of a Music Student Center. His dream came true and he will be remembered. When he passed on Dr. Charles Muench carried on as musical director of the Summer concerts.

Today a marvelous new era has begun at Tanglewood and Erich Leinsdorf, the present Boston Symphony Orchestra musical director has great dreams—not only for the Festival concert but for the academy. He wishes the youth center to be second to none in the world. In the short time he has been among us wonderful things have been accomplished.

Tanglewood will live forever in these Spiritual Hills. We, of the Berkshires extend greetings and best wishes to Erich Leinsdorf, our musical director, Thomas Perry Jr., splendid manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all the fine people associated at Tanglewood.

Do come to the Berkshire Festival June 30 to Aug. 2, 1964.

JANICE CLARKSON CLEWORTH
Melody Farm (Stockbridge, Mass.)

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

MEDINA JOURNAL
Friday, July 10, 1964

Today's Opinions

Pierre Monteux

"Retire? Is that an English word I have not yet learned?"

Thus Pierre Monteux quipped with a reporter when asked what he intended to do after leaving his post as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, a position he held for 16 years.

And that was 13 years ago.

Monteux never retired. He conducted his last concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last December. He had agreed to conduct his 99th anniversary concert in Boston on April 4, 1965. He conducted the final concert of his career in Rome last April.

Musically his place in 20th-century music will be preserved through his many excellent recordings. Historically, however, he will remain one of the giants of our time. It was he who conducted the unforgettable world premiere of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" back in 1913. He was also on hand to guide the first performances of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

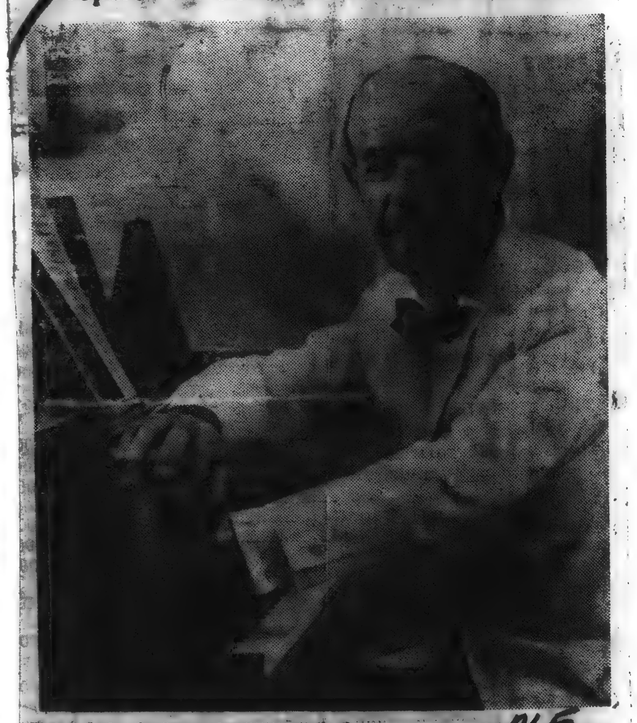
Though his name will be linked forever with these masterworks, Monteux's greatest triumph was his joyous activity through his fruitful career. The word retire was just not in his vocabulary.

—Christian Science Monitor

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

WELLSVILLE DEMOCRAT
Thursday, July 9, 1964

Prepares for Berkshire Festival Broadcasts



Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, prepares programs for the Orchestra's annual summer move to Tanglewood, Mass., for Berkshire Festival concerts. They will be heard, beginning in mid-July, on WBEN-FM (102.5 mc) Wednesday nights from 8 to 10 o'clock, and on WBEN-Radio (930 kw) Saturdays at 8:30 PM.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 41,075

JUL 1 1 1964

Don't Take Little Tots To Concerts

Lenox, Mass.—In order to provide the necessary concert decorum at the Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center performances at Tanglewood, the administration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra asked parents and camp directors to preserve the quiet found in any concert hall.

While the activities at Tanglewood are intended primarily for adult audiences, properly supervised children and young people who are prepared to enjoy and listen to the music are welcome. Infants and children not yet ready to enjoy the concerts are discouraged from attending.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, stated in a letter to camp managements:

"Being a father of five I know that vitality and exuberance are exactly what we look for in our youngsters. We, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, want more than anything else to have the enthusiasm, affection, and interest of the young.

"Thus we welcome to Tanglewood the children who are prepared to listen, and we hope that the parents will bring them, and that the camp managements will lead them to our appropriate offerings as often as possible.

Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Bee
NEWTOWN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,248

JUL 10 1964

The administration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is inviting the cooperation of parents and camp directors in preserving the quiet found in any concert hall. While the activities at Tanglewood are intended primarily for adult audiences, properly supervised children and young people who are prepared to enjoy and listen to the music are welcome. Camps intending to send groups to any program at Tanglewood are asked to telephone Norman S. Shirk, assistant manager of the orchestra, at Lenox 637-1600 several days in advance of the expected visit.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 281,586

JUL 5 1964

(Photo by Clemens Kalischer)

MUSIC TO RELAX BY—BOSTON SYMPHONY STYLE AT TANGLEWOOD

Symphony under the Sun and the Stars

By IRENE SAINT

Lazing in the sun or lying under the stars may seem to some a strange way of listening to symphonic music. To many a traditionalist, a symphony concert is a signal for formal dress; rapt attention (no program rattling, please!) in a stuffy city music hall; a quick smoke at intermission in a sardine-packed lobby.

But a quarter of a million persons, like those pictured here have found a more informal, more uplifting, and certainly cheaper way to enjoy superior classical music. That number treks each season to Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Lenox.

There, in the midst of the rolling Berkshire Hills, concert-goers can combine their love of classical music with a savoring of the beauties of nature.

THE 210-ACRE Tanglewood, once a gentleman-farmer's estate, has formal gardens, hemlock hedges and avenues of tall pines to wander through before settling down for the concerts.

While some prefer the comfort of the open-sided auditorium, which seats 6,000, half again as many, when the weather is fine, choose to stay out on the spacious lawn. To keep the lawn's broad expanse in putting-green condition, the Boston is the only symphony orchestra to own a tractor.

It is a common sight to see whole families arrive well in advance of the concerts, with commodious picnic baskets. They spread out blankets, set up lawn chairs for the older folk, settle the children, and open their hampers.

Once the music starts the audience's attention is no less rapt than city concert-goers, but in the informal setting young lovers do a little necking, serious music students follow the score, housewives knit, while their husbands catch up with the ball scores. The orchestra's music spreads with perfect clarity to the farthest reaches of the eight-acre, tree-rimmed lawn, without artificial amplification, due to the magnificent acoustics of the auditorium.

This year for the eight-week season, which runs from June 30 to Aug. 23, the Boston Symphony's musical director, Erich Leinsdorf, has planned an exciting program.

To honor Richard Strauss on the composer's 100th birthday this year, there will be a Strauss cycle beginning with the American premier of the full score of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhommie" July 12. For later weekend concerts, Leinsdorf has scheduled such familiar and favorite Strauss scores as "Don Juan", Op. 20; "Also Sprach Zarathustra" the prelude and waltz sequence from "Der Rosenkavalier", Op. 59; and "Death and Transfiguration", Op. 24.

FOR THOSE WHO like their music more modern, there is a sprinkling in the programming of Mahler, Schuller, Smetana and Hovhaness. And for regular Tanglewood fans there will be a generous dose of works that have not before been played at Tanglewood.

Last year the premier of Benjamin Brittens' "Requiem" demonstrated to Tanglewood regulars who were observing Leinsdorf in his first summer festival season the conductor's extraordinary talent for handling the difficult combination of a full symphony orchestra and a large chorus.

Leinsdorf's long association with the Metropolitan Opera Company, as well as with symphony orchestras in the U.S. and abroad, held him in good stead when he was faced with the Boston Symphony's full complement of 104 plus Boston's Chorus pro Musica's 120.

Again this year he will conduct some orchestra-plus-chorus pieces, among them Verdi's "Requiem", with the Chorus pro Musica, Aug. 22; and Menotti's "Death of the Bishop of Brindisi", Aug. 8.

A full weekend can be planned around a favorite Tanglewood program to include jazz or folk music at the Music Barn, also in Lenox; the dance at Jacob's Pillow in nearby Lee; or good summer theater at Williamstown or Stockbridge, neither far from Tanglewood.

But, whenever you go, however long you stay, the high point of your visit to Tanglewood is likely to be the experience of hearing the sound of symphony in the soft sunshine or under the stars.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 441,810
JUL 6 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Crier
WESTPORT, Conn.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 5,912
JUL 9 1964

Symphony Wants Quiet Listeners

In order to provide the necessary concert decorum at the Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center performances at Tanglewood this summer, the administration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is inviting the cooperation of parents and camp directors in preserving the quiet found in any concert hall.

While the activities at Tanglewood are intended primarily for adult audiences, properly supervised children and young people who are prepared to enjoy and listen to the music are welcome. Infants and children not yet ready to enjoy the concerts are discouraged from attending.

Eric Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stated in a letter to camp managements, "Being a father of five I know that vitality and exuberance are exactly what we look for in our youngsters. We, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, want more than anything else to have the enthusiasm, affection, and interest of the young. Thus we welcome to Tanglewood the children who are prepared to listen, and we hope that the parents will bring them, and that the camp managements will lead them to our appropriate offerings as often as possible. Once this has been stated, it is necessary to remind their supervisors, be they parents or camp personnel, that everybody attending Tanglewood performances is entitled to listen undisturbed to the music."

Camps intending to send groups to any program at Tanglewood are asked to telephone Norman S. Shirk, Assistant Manager of the Orchestra, at Tanglewood several days in advance of the expected visit.

NEW YORK
AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 76,558 SUN. 76,558
JUL 15 1964

Brooklyn Academy of Music Sponsors Annual "Sunday at Tanglewood"

In celebration of the 100th anniversary of Richard Strauss' birth, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Waltz Sequence No. 1 from Strauss' opera, "Der Rosenkavalier" at Tanglewood on Sunday, August 2nd, when the Brooklyn Academy of Music sponsors its 8th annual "Sunday at Tanglewood," a one-day excursion to the music festival.

In addition to the Strauss excerpt, the August 2nd excursionists will hear two Tanglewood premiere's—Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 in D and Bela Bartok's Violin Concerto, with Joseph Silverstein, concert-master of the Orchestra, as soloist.

More than 2,100 persons have enjoyed participating in the Brooklyn Academy of Music excursions in past seasons. The all-inclusive cost of the August 2nd outing is $14.50, with Brooklyn Academy of Music members for the 1964-65 season being entitled to a reduction of $1. The excursionists leave at 8:30 A.M. chartered, air-conditioned buses, enjoy a chicken picnic lunch before the concert, sit in o reserved seat inside the Music Shed during the concert, and are given a supper snack before boarding the bus for the return trip to New York.

Reservations for the excursion close Tuesday, July 28th, at 5 P.M. Reservation blanks and further details may be obtained by calling STerling 3-6700.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Wilton Journal
MILFORD, N. H.
Weekly Circ. 550
JUL 16 1964

Week-end at Tanglewood

Souhegan Valley Group Joins the Appreciative Crowds to Hear Music at Berkshire Festival

(Only a three-hour drive from the Souhegan valley is Tanglewood, in the Berkshires, where world-famous music festivals are held. Last weekend four Amherst and Milford women who have played and enjoyed music together, drove to Tanglewood. It is the kind of thing so many people talk about doing, but relatively few carry out their intentions. We asked Mrs. Harry A. Porter of Milford to jot down her experiences and her impressions of a pleasant weekend and a thrilling musical experience so close to home.—Ed.)

By Jeanne Porter

Marguerite Brockway, Reina Hart, Betty Stewart and I took off for Tanglewood Friday afternoon. After getting lost several times on our way to the Mass. Pike we finally scurried along and arrived at our "Guest Home" about 5:45 p. m. We had two rooms on the third floor of a very large home in Lenox and after cleaning up, we ate dinner at a nearby Howard Johnson's. As we wound around the streets, Betty was full of all the various experiences she had had there as a student for one summer at Tanglewood and it was much fun to hear her go on and on.

We arrived at the gate of Tanglewood about one-half hour before concert time and we were amazed at how exceedingly well the cars on the roads leading into the parking lots were directed. There was absolutely no way to make any error, for attendants were very plentiful and kept shifting their positions—while still keeping straight lines—so that it was like an assembly line of cars being parked. I never saw anything like it in my life. With thousands of people arriving at virtually the same time, we were parked and out of our car in about two and a half minutes.

As we approached the main gate we could feel the quiet atmosphere already expectant of great music. The panoramic view of the foothills of the Berkshires is tremendous. The fenced-in area is surrounded by very tall, magnificent pine trees (Tanglewood is a very large area) except on the one side which exposes the view. Inside the gate, the huge music shed, seating an estimated 6,000 people, is surrounded by a large apron of beautifully cared-for lawn where many, many people sit on blankets and eat picnic-type food. In view of this, one is amazed at the silence throughout each concert, plus the tidiness afterwards. No paper napkins thrown around! No potato chip bags under bushes! It's almost like being in Europe!!

What can one say about the "par excellence" of these concerts made available to everyone? People like Leonard Bernstein and Madam Koussevitzky are apt to be seen anywhere on the grounds mingling with thousands of fascinated music lovers. During our short weekend we heard an evening of Schubert including Symphony No. 3 in D and Mass in E flat, No. 6, sung beautifully by Eunice Alberts contralto, Saramac Endich, soprano, Walter Carringer, tenor, and Donald Bell, bass. The Festival Chorus participated in this also.

Saturday morning, for $1.50 we heard the rehearsal of the Sunday afternoon program and it is a joy to watch Erich Leinsdorf conduct, for he does it with such dignity and finesse. He is a smaller man than I had expected, but has such graceful hands and each finger motion has meaning for the orchestra. His conducting is very much like that of Fritz Reiner's.

Saturday afternoon we walked over the grounds to see the Theatre Building, the Chamber Music Hall, the large house containing practice rooms, formal gardens, and the lovely panoramic view, again, of the Berkshires.

Saturday night we ate our "special" dinner at the Curtis Hotel in Lenox, where Betty had played in a trio years ago. It has a typical, large, gracious dining room, similar to those at Chautauqua, and afterwards we bought a few things in the hotel gift shop to bring home to our children.

The concert that night was of Mozart, and of special charm and grace was the piano Concerto No. 11 in F major, done by a young pianist named Malcom Frager who played it superbly.

Sunday morning we heard a lovely Bach Ensemble of students who did two cantatas—with harpsichord—and we were thrilled. The girls left at lunchtime to begin their return trip home, but, since our friend Bill was staying for the afternoon concert, I prevailed upon him to let me keep him company, so I had a special bonus with the afternoon concert thrown in.

The Symphony did a Richard Strauss number based on a humorous poem called "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" by Moliere, which I had heard in rehearsal the day before. With Helen Boatwright, Helen Vanni, Donald Bell, singing the character parts and Mac Morgan doing the very funny narrative, it was and is one of the funniest musical scores I've ever heard. This was the first performance of this entire work in America.

Joseph Silverstein, the symphony concert master, played such beautiful Mozart on his violin, he had the audience just captivated.

We left to return to Milford at 5:30 p. m. wondering how and when we might get back to Tanglewood—and soon! It is easy to write for tickets and nearly all homes in the surrounding towns of Stockbridge, Lenox, Lee, Pittsfield, North Adams and Williamstown, open rooms to be made available to guests. There are information centers in these towns and one only need go to one to find an available room.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,063
JUL 11 1964

Lee Youth Is Still Critical After Lenox Fall

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (UPI)—George O'Bren, 19, of Lee remained in critical condition today with injuries suffered when he fell from a tree on the grounds of the Berkshire Music Festival in Lenox.

O'Brien, an employe of a Lenox electrical firm, sustained fractures of the skull, shoulders, collar bone, hip and wrist in the 40-foot fall Friday.

Officials said O'Brien lost his footing while sawing a limb which obstructed a spotlight.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JUL 11 1964

Lee Youth Badly Hurt In Fall at Tanglewood

LENOX — A Lee youth who toppled from a tree while working at Tanglewood Friday morning was listed in critical condition later at St. Luke's Hospital, Pittsfield.

Multiple Fractures

George O'Brien of 1 David Ave. suffered fractures of the skull, right shoulder, right collarbone, left hip and left wrist and possible internal injuries, according to Dr. Carl A. Bergan, who treated him at the scene.

Employed by Lahart and Son Electricians of Lenox, O'Brien had just finished sawing off a limb that obstructed a spotlight at Tanglewood's Hawthorne St. parking lot when he lost his footing and plummeted some 40 feet to the ground, landing in bushes. He was rushed to the hospital by Lenox Fire Department ambulance.

LAKE RONKONKOMA
REVIEW
W. 700
JUL 16 1964

A PLEASANT WAY TO SPEND A WEEKEND

Looking for pleasant way to spend a weekend? I would suggest a weekend in New England with a special effort to take in at least one performance at Tanglewood (The Berkshire Music Festival), in Massachusetts. Complete listings of performances are given in the "Times" and the "Tribune" every Sunday.

Performances at Tanglewood are given in a lovely setting that provides opportunity for indoor or outdoor listening. One can purchase a seat under the shed or simply purchase admission to the grounds outside the open air auditorium and sit beneath the stars. Acoustics are excellent either way.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Item (e)
LYNN, Mass.
Circ. 33,843
JUL 1 [illegible]

Sights and Sidelights BY THE SIGHTSEER

An unusual story has come to the Sightseer's attention of interest to Greater Lynn television viewers and music lovers, especially those who were fortunate enough to attend "Lynn Item Night at Pops."

The story concerns David M. Davis and Jordan M. Whitelaw, both known and respected in Boston musical circles, and how they "make music with four cameras."

Davis and Whitelaw are responsible for telecasting Boston Pops Orchestra concerts for Channel 2. Extraordinary as it may seem, their meticulous plan is accomplished without a single rehearsal with the orchestra. But they have their own rehearsal schedule. It goes something like this:

Several weeks in advance Whitelaw, who is the producer, works out the musical planning and indicates the shots he would like. A week before the concert, the two men go through the score together, listening to recordings and working out a complete analysis.

Davis, who is station manager, must mark every single picture on the score itself and on a separate list which is duplicated and issued to members of the staff working with them at concert time. Each shot is numbered and coded with symbols.

The weekend before the concert Davis plays and replays the tape, at least a half dozen times, and every single move of the camera is plotted and timed.

A "dry run" with cameramen and assistants takes place around a table, with a recording of the music and a blackboard to map the work the afternoon before the concert at Symphony Hall.

By 6 PM chairs for the orchestra are on stage, cameras are in place, so the entire staff goes through the camera shots once again, focusing on empty seats.

Shortly after 8 PM when the audience begins to arrive for the 8:30 concert, there is one final technical check. The timing is so exact that if the score calls for 16 measures of violins, the camera will travel the length of the violin section at exactly the right pace to end up on the concertmaster in the allotted time.

"A perfectly televised concert is a combination of skill and luck," says Davis, philosophically.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304
JUL 14 1964

The Lively Arts

By Milton R. Bass

James J. Brosnahan

PICTURE to yourself a gorgeous July night at Tanglewood, the skies clear and the stars winking brightly, the orchestra in their white coats setting off the scarlet jacket of their leader, a breeze of just the right temperature blowing the scent of summer throughout the Shed and the lovely strains of a Mozart serenade floating to the heavens.

Picture to yourself the average businessman sitting in one of the $5.50 seats, contemplating the 104 musicians on stage, the 6,000 people in the seats and the multitude on the lawn, and you can just see him stop to figure how much money is involved in all this esthetic transportation.

* * *

THERE IS a man who knows to the penny, and his name is James J. Brosnahan, assistant treasurer and business administrator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Brosnahan has been with the BSO for 40 years, starting as a runner in the treasurer's office right out of prep school and taking over as assistant treasurer in 1936, when the entire BSO budget was under $500,000 for the year.

The present BSO budget is approximately $3 million per year, with some 85 per cent of it going for salaries. The second highest cost is for printing. The BSO turns out 300,000 programs for its winter concerts, 150,000 programs for the Pops concerts, 200,000 programs for the Tanglewood concerts and 140,000 small programs for Esplanade concerts. All these programs plus the tickets for the concerts add up to a printing bill of $200,000 per year.

* * *

IT COSTS the BSO $60,000 to maintain Tanglewood on a year-round basis with a permanent staff of five and it takes a staff of 50 to run Symphony Hall in Boston. The costs of musical scores and composers' rights comes to around $20,000 a year, and transportation expenses for the annual trek to New York and environs is $40,000.

The annual deficit of the Boston Symphony is around $250,000, which is made up by public subscription and in real lean years by dipping into the endowment fund, which is now about $2 million.

Tanglewood grossed $568,453 in ticket sales last year, but the concerts showed a deficit of $10,000 and the Berkshire Music Center school a deficit of $50,000. This year tickets have been raised 50 cents in all brackets, and if attendance holds up, a small profit will be realized.

* * *

MR. BROSNAHAN'S duties have become quite varied in the past few years, what with keeping up two home sites, running a cafeteria, dealing with three unions, running a payroll on a year-round basis in two different localities, handling record royalties and seeing that the artistic end doesn't have to concern itself with the business end.

He enjoys every minute of it, but he doesn't recommend it as a career for any young hopeful because there are so few symphony orchestras with the stature, schedule or real estate holdings of the Boston Symphony. Symphony orchestras are springing up all over the country, but nearly all of them have only one or two people in the business end. Mr. Brosnahan raised his own boy to be a lawyer, a field with a symphony of opportunities.

* * *

ONE OF THE problems a business manager has to face is the drop in record royalties whenever a new conductor takes over the orchestra. The BSO averages some $250,000 a year in record royalities, half from the BSO proper and the other half from the Pops recordings under Arthur Fiedler. Mr. Fiedler has been with the Pops nearly 50 years, and those royalties roll in every year like they were telephone company stock dividends. But when Mr. Munch took over from Koussevitzky, it took a while for the symphonic records to start an upward spiral again, and the same thing occurred when Mr. Leinsdorf took over from Mr. Munch.

"But," said Mr. Brosnahan, with the smile of an old coach who has seen his bonus baby come through exactly as hoped for, "Mr. Leinsdorf has done very well for the first year."

There's no business like show business.

179

SPRINGFIELD Republican 7/19/64

COLLEGE STUDENTS SERVE AS GUIDES AT TANGLEWOOD

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—If on a sunny day you present yourself at the main gate at Tanglewood and join a small group of visitors to tour the grounds with a guide who tells funny stories about the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a British accent, don't believe him.

Don't believe the accent, anyway, because he is just playing a college-boy game of make believe to entertain himself as well as his listeners. The accent has no connection with his place of origin or with the information he has to offer about Tanglewood.

One of 14

The odds are against drawing him as a guide, however, because he is only one of 14 college men hired from 70 applicants this summer for posts on the Tanglewood guide crew.

But there is another who has an idea he might like to be an actor and uses his little audiences on the guided tour to flex his acting muscles.

And there are other guides who like to sing or play musical instruments, although they don't serenade the tour visitors, and there is one this year who has taught school in Northern Rhodesia and is learning Swahili.

At any given time in the day there are probably seven or eight Tanglewood guides on duty because they have to fulfill their responsibilities seven days a week from 8.30 a. m. to about 10 p. m. (or when the concert ends) and are scheduled to be at work only 40 to 45 hours during a 5½-day-week.

Allied Chores

Do they really have that much guiding to do?

No. The title is a catch-all label for several allied chores including guiding, all under the supervision of Harry Kraut, administrator of the Berkshire Music Center.

He tries to interview all applicants during the spring (usually in New York or Boston), and sends a sheaf of factual information about the orchestra, the center and Tanglewood to those hired.

Thus they are briefed before they arrive and after they make a couple of special guided tours for guides, their first chore usually is to assist in receiving nearly 250 young musicians who arrive at the end of June to study at the center.

Then for the rest of the season their regular responsibilities include tending the gates ("The grounds will open at 12.30, sir."), welcoming visitors ("There will be another tour in about 10 minutes, sir."), answering questions ("Yes mam, the shed seats 6037.").

They also clear the grounds of straying listeners after concerts, keep an eye on the center members as they make their rounds from studio to rehearsal hall to cafeteria, act as airport chauffeurs for upper-level musicians, run messages and errands for the center administration, serve as ushers at concerts by center members and handle special chores such as operating a slide projector at a panel discussion.

And sometimes, seemingly just to make sure that the title of guide is misleading, they are asked to solve mysteries such as the strange disappearance of Eduardo Mata's trunk.

He flew to Tanglewood early this month from Mexico City to spend the summer studying conducting. Up to last Wednesday, his trunk was still on the way, presumably.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711
JUL 25 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499
JUL 23 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUL 21 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
Transcript
Eve. Circ. 13,240
JUL 24 1964

Memorial Service For Koussevitzky Sunday in Lenox

The 12th annual memorial service for Serge Koussevitzky will be held at the Church on the Hill, Lenox, Sunday morning at 11 on the anniversary of the 90th birthday of the late Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky was conductor of the Boston Symphony for 25 years from 1924 to 1949. He was the first director of the Berkshire Music Center which he helped to establish in cooperation with the orchestra in 1940, and his grave is located in the cemetery of the church.

The service at the Church on the Hill will be conducted by the Rev. David E. Moore. His meditation will be entitled "His Praise Song Stands Forever."

During the service the Vocal Department of the Berkshire Music Center, assisted by a string quartet with oboe, will present three choral selections: Motet from Part II of the German Requiem by Heinrich Schutz; the Sinfonia and Chorus from Bach's Cantata No. 21, "Ich hatte viel Bekummernis"; and the Kyrie from Franz Schubert's Mass in E-Flat major.

After the service in the church the chorus and congregation will move to the graveside of Serge Koussevitzky, and the chorus will sing Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," which was written expressly for the opening of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940.

The public is cordially invited to attend the Serge Koussevitzky Memorial Service.

New England Newspaper Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUL 8 1964

The crowd at Tanglewood wasn't very big when Photographer Mitchell stopped by to shoot the boarded shed (above) and white-capped shrubs (right).

New England Newspaper Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 161,453
JUL 21 1964

SERPENT tuba, one of many strange musical instruments on display at the new Berkshire Museum at Pittsfield, is tried out by Josef Orosz, trombonist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The instrument, named because it resembles a coiled serpent, is made of wood, covered with leather. It is coiled to permit the player to reach the lengthy tubing. (AP Photo)

MUSICAL MERCHANDISE
REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 6,700
JUN 1964

Old Musical Instruments Shown At Music Show

The more than 20,000 visitors attending the 1964 Music Show at Chicago's Conrad Hilton Hotel will be able to inspect the very latest musical instruments, accessories, pianos, organs, and hi-fidelity equipment. However, this display of new products in the music world will be garnished with a unique, contrasting exhibit of old musical instruments dating from the 16th to the 19th Century.

Shown will be more than 60 of the music antiques which have been loaned to the National Association of Music Merchants, the show's sponsor, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among the archaic instruments are a serpent, a bass wind instrument of the 16th Century; a pochette, a tiny violin used in olden days by dancing masters; a bull roarer, a carved stick whirled at the end of a cord; and a tromba marina, a seven-foot tall single stringed instrument. Also on view will be a combined flute and walking stick used by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, and a hurdy-gurdy which dates back to the 10th Century.

An instrument which is not likely to be seen on music dealers' counters or shelves today is this French lyre, which once belonged to Madame de Maintenon, second wife of King Louis XIV.

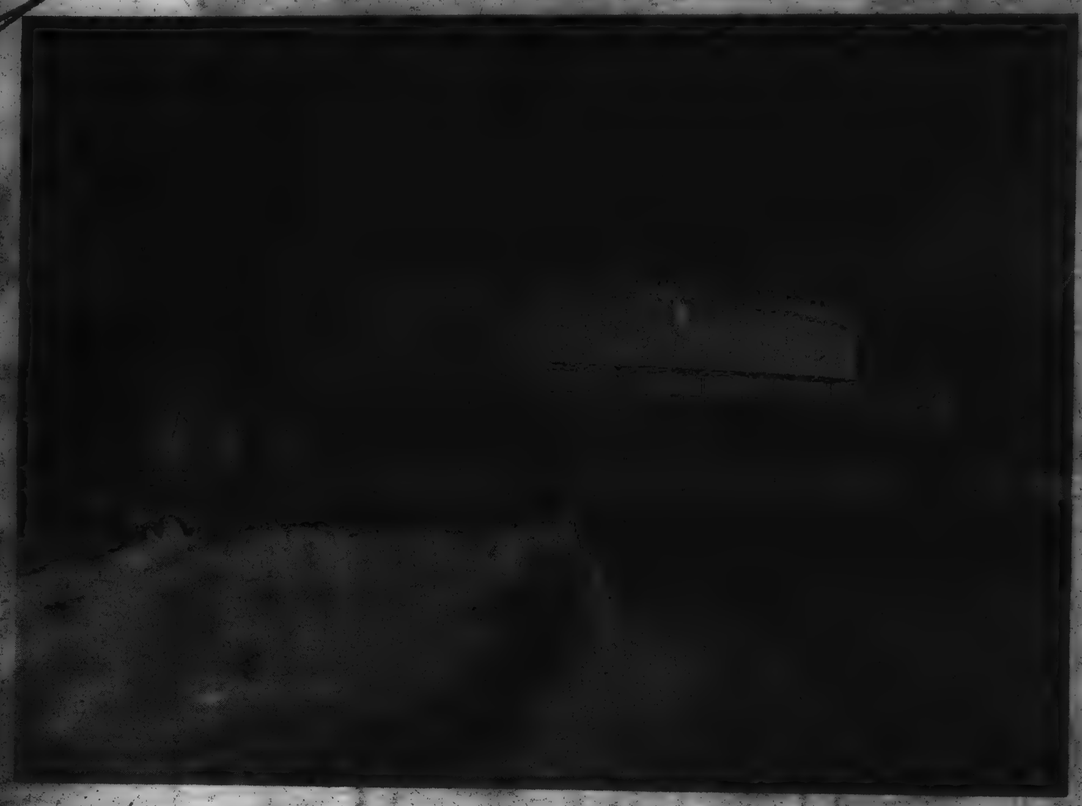
The collection once belonged to Henri Casadesus, a French musician who was the uncle of famed pianist Robert Casadesus. Obtained by the Boston Symphony in 1926 at the suggestion of conductor Serge Koussevitzsy by friends of the orchestra in honor of its founder, Henry Lee Higginson, the collection is said to represent the finest of old world craftsmanship.

According to NAMM, plans are to set up the unusual exhibit in a conveniently-located, easily-accessible display area in the Eighth Street lobby of the Conrad Hilton.

It's doubtful that many dealers today will get a request for this type of instrument.

One of the archaic music instruments being shown at the NAMM Music Show.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUL 1964



The crowd at Tanglewood wasn't very big when Photographer Mitchell stopped by to shoot the boarded shed (above) and white-capped shrubs (right).

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 161,453
JUL 21 1964

SERPENT tuba, one of many strange musical instruments on display at the new Berkshire Museum at Pittsfield, is tried out by Josef Orosz, trombonist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The instrument, named because it resembles a coiled serpent, is made of wood, covered with leather. It is coiled to permit the player to reach the lengthy tubing. (AP Photo)

MUSICAL MERCHANDISE
REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 6,700
JUN 1964

Old Musical Instruments Shown At Music Show

The more than 20,000 visitors attending the 1964 Music Show at Chicago's Conrad Hilton Hotel will be able to inspect the very latest musical instruments, accessories, pianos, organs, and hi-fidelity equipment. However, this display of new products in the music world will be garnished with a unique, contrasting exhibit of old musical instruments dating from the 16th to the 19th Century.

Shown will be more than 60 of the music antiques which have been loaned to the National Association of Music Merchants, the show's sponsor, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among the archaic instruments are a serpent, a bass wind instrument of the 16th Century; a pochette, a tiny violin used in olden days by dancing masters; a bull roarer, a carved stick whirled at the end of a cord; and a tromba marina, a seven-foot tall single stringed instrument. Also on view will be a combined flute and walking stick used by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, and a hurdy-gurdy which dates back to the 10th Century.

An instrument which is not likely to be seen on music dealers' counters or shelves today is this French lyre, which once belonged to Madame de Maintenon, second wife of King Louis XIV.

The collection once belonged to Henri Casadesus, a French musician who was the uncle of famed pianist Robert Casadesus. Obtained by the Boston Symphony in 1926 at the suggestion of conductor Serge Koussevitzky by friends of the orchestra in honor of its founder, Henry Lee Higginson, the collection is said to represent the finest of old world craftsmanship.

According to NAMM, plans are to set up the unusual exhibit in a conveniently-located, easily-accessible display area in the Eighth Street lobby of the Conrad Hilton.

It's doubtful that many ... dealers today will get a request f... an instrument of this type.

One of the archaic music instruments being shown at the NAMM Music Show.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hour (e)
NORWALK, Conn.
Circ. 19,220

JUL 21 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 44,966

JUL 21 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

DANBURY, CONN.
News-Times
Eve. Circ. 23,828

JUL 21 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,499

JUL 21 1964

PITTSFIELD (AP)—The Berkshire Museum opened formally today with some strange musical instruemtsn on display, including serpents.

The serpent is the ancestor of the modern bass tuba and was so called because it actually resembles a coiled serpent.

It was coiled in order to bring within the player's reach the lengthy tubing required to produce the low notes of old-time church and military music.

It is made of wood and covered with leather and as far as anyone can determine only Josef Orosz, trombonist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, can play it.

He trained himself to play it and the orchestra plans to use it from time to time.

The instrument was known to have been used by the Union Army during the Civil War.

...music dealers
...for an instru-

...music instruments
...MM Music Show.

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304

JUL 21 1964

Versailles Court Instruments On View at Berkshire Museum

BAROQUE MUSIC was written during the 17th century to be played on these venerable ancestors of the string family. Violinist Isaac Stern admires a selection of the instruments, on view at the Berkshire Museum until Aug. 13.

By LISA LANSING

The Berkshire Museum's current visiting collection sounds as if it belonged in a zoo rather than in an open exhibition. But the display of serpents, citterns and theorbos is not as lively and dangerous as it seems.

The Casadesus Collection has grouped the venerable ancestors of modern orchestral instruments and brought them from every corner of the world to a new home in Symphony Hall, Boston. The collection is on loan to the Berkshire Museum until Aug. 13.

Laning Humphrey, curator of the group of more than 40 instruments, explained that the collection had been bought during the 19th century by Henri Casadesus, father of the pianist Robert Casadesus, from the Count of Bricqueville, a noble dilettante sorely in need of money.

Serpents the Strangest

Among the oldest pieces with the strangest history are the serpents. This ancestor of both brass and wind instruments is made of wood and covered with leather. One serpent in the collection curls menacingly in a double S to bring the fingering holes within reach of the player and is crusted with low relief figures of the arms of the 16th century Republic of Venice and characters from myths. One of the serpents on view, a French copy of the Italian design, is finished off with a large brilliantly colored representation of a snake's mouth complete with a full set of teeth.

A number of the instruments were played at the 18th century court at Versailles, where music was a fad of courtiers and rulers alike. In the collection is an ivory fife with a tiny bore. According to Mr. Humphrey, the pipe was used to charm birds during a hunt and also to simulate woodland sounds in court musicales.

Another fad of the court at the time of Louis XVI was imitating the simple pastoral charm of the peasants. A small petit point bagpipe with ivory pipes, purchased by Bricqueville's great-grandfather, is an indication that the court's idea of the simple life extended to music as well as to noble masquerades.

Also among the collection of royal instruments is a walking stick, owned by Frederick the Great of Prussia, which is fitted out with fingering holes so it can become a flute at moment's notice. It is believed that Haydn wrote music for this flute-cum-walking stick.

'The King of Instruments'

The stringed instruments are represented by the lute, which Mr. Humphrey calls "the king of instruments," and by the theorbo. This medieval lute, referred to in Shakespeare, is equipped with 15 tuning pegs. When its simplified form, the cittern, migrated from Spain to England, the British mispronounced the name as "gittern" and later, probably, to "guitar."

The plucked string instruments in the collection are lavishly decorated with reliefs of ivory carved into cupids, and often with intricately carved male heads on the scroll of the neck.

The violin section is made complete by a tiny pocket violin only a foot long, which, with its tiny bow, could be slipped easily into the pocket of an 18th century greatcoat. The instrument was probably used, according to Mr. Humphrey, by dancing masters both in this country and in France to accompany the lessons they gave.

Memorial to Higginson

The collection was given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the 1920s in memory of Henry Lee Higginson, for many years a patron of the orchestra. The instruments were very popular at the time among Boston society's music lovers, who often spent their afternoons listening to concerts presented on theorbo, serpent and cittern.

The instruments were played this spring for a taped television broadcast by members of the BSO who have learned how to play in the 17th century manner. Cellist Martin Hoherman plays the Elizabethan theorbo, and Josef Orosz of the trombone section has played the serpent in the group sessions.

Thirty-five pieces from the collection are on view in the second floor display room at the museum.

TANGLEWOOD TWILIGHT

Q. Will any of the Berkshire Festival programs include Wagnerian music this season? Is the New Haven running its usual excursions to Tanglewood? If so, please tell me how to find out about them.

NG —N.A.

A. The only Wagner selections programmed this season will be played Sunday, July 26, when the Boston Symphony, under the baton of William Steinberg, will play excerpts from "Gotterdammerung," and Saturday, Aug. 22, when Erich Leinsdorf will conduct part of Act III of "Die Walkyre." The New Haven excursions are scheduled for Sundays only. Tickets must be purchased in advance at the railroad's ticket offices in Grand Central Terminal or in Stamford Conn., during the week preceding the date of the excursion. The cost ($8.95 for adults, $6.50, children aged 5 and under 12) includes transportation and general admission to the concert.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

JUL 25 1964

181

Comment

Musical Immortality—The Great Mystery

From a speech by Erich Leinsdorf, BSO conductor, to the students of the Berkshire Music Center, June 28, 1964

What is a composer and what does the world expect of him? What is a creative artist? His work—at its best—mirrors the world of his day . . . and outlives him and his era.

We play Beethoven today and not Cherubini, though he was a successful contemporary. What mysterious reasons account for Beethoven's universality in music which communicates nearly 140 years after his death just as meaningfully to audiences and musicians as when the composer lived, while Cherubini possesses the appeal of historic curiosity only?

Consider this year, 1964: a century after the death of Meyerbeer, and after the birth of Richard Strauss. The first is probably totally unknown to most of you, for he is no longer performed. Occasional attempts at revival by enthusiastic groups in recent years have failed—and probably for good reasons. It is difficult to give an adequate description of Meyerbeer's raging success with the public in his lifetime. He sat on a throne comparable to that of the great 19th-century composers.

Strauss, 100 years after his birth, is a problem. I believe that a good part of his life work is of truly genius caliber, yet he lived and composed much longer than the period which he represented. What we of posterity say about these men has nothing to do with their avowed objectives.

When composers today are faced with public non-acceptance, we hear references to later generations who will understand, thus implying that the contemporaries do not understand. This may, once in a blue century, be the case. But as a rule, to be applied generally, the argument will not hold water. Composers always work for their contemporaries, and worrying about immortality is rare.

The philosophical problem of the creative artist is how to find the proper way of expressing himself without indulging in ways unintelligible to contemporary ears; or, on the other extreme, how not to be a slave to instantaneous acceptance to a point where he may land unwittingly as a commercial artist. Yet, if the talent of a man should be in the line of commercial artistry, he is again wrong, toward himself and toward the world, by trying to be something else. There are types whose creative impulse dries up if they do not receive instantaneous approval of the masses; and there are others who think they are not creative if they receive any kind of immediate acceptance.

To find himself and yet not alienate listeners from his music is a great achievement for any composer.

ATHENS, N. Y.
HERALD
W. 300

JUL 30 1964

HUGE CROWDS at Tanglewood last weekend, at major concerts Friday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoon, totaled more than 30,000 and contributed to the largest tourist weekend of the season in the Berkshire Hills. Hotels, motels and tourist homes throughout the tri-state area were filled.

New York World-Telegram and
The Sun
D. 423,849 SAT. 142,176

JUL 25 1964

Travel and Resorts

Berkshires Offer Outdoor Concerts

Many Americans who are visiting the East this summer should take advantage of the opportunity to drive to the beautiful Berkshire Hills in Western Massachusetts.

Right in the heart of the Berkshires is Tanglewood, at Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is a three-hour drive from New York City via excellent highways, and offers an interesting contrast to the excitement and hubbub of the World's Fair.

At Tanglewood, which has been a mecca for music lovers for 29 years, visitors may spend an evening or a weekend hearing Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, and many distinguished guest conductors and soloists.

Seats for 6000

The wedge-shaped Music Shed, which is open on three sides to allow a view of stately trees and shrubs, can easily seat 6000 persons, and the spacious lawns surrounding it accommodate an additional 6000 to 9000. Many people prefer to bring blankets and folding chairs to enjoy a concert under the stars, since the music is amplified throughout the lawns.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., has added much to the original estate to provide comfort and convenience for Tanglewood visitors. There are five large parking lots, all of which are free and are policed throughout the concerts by experienced parking attendants with the aid of walkie-talkie radios.

Box Lunches and Music

Traffic on the approaching roads is directed by Massachusetts State Police patrolmen. On the grounds, within easy walking distance of the Music Shed, visitors may purchase box lunches and beverages at the open-air cafeteria, browse at the music store for books, recordings and scores, and visit the Glass Reception House at the Main Gate, where representative art exhibits from the local museums and art colonies are always on display.

On week days guided tours of the grounds are conducted at frequent intervals, to enable visitors to see the estate without disturbing the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music which runs concurrently with the Berkshire Festival.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4208

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304

JUL 25 1964

James F. Kiley:

Tanglewood's Keeper

Birnie

James F. Kiley rides herd on Tanglewood's lawns.

By Ann Shanahan

This is the fifth in a Berkshire Week series designed to delve below the surface and reveal the wheels that keep summertime Berkshire rolling smoothly.

ALL PERFECTION at Tanglewood is divided into two parts: the audio and the visual, or, the music and the grounds. And just as the Boston Symphony's members alertly take their cues from Erich Leinsdorf, so does each blade of grass on the manicured grounds pay attention to the call of one James F. Kiley.

Kiley is the man who supervises the lush setting that is unmarred by weeds, crabgrass, dandelions or patches of seared lawn. His obvious ability can be envied by all those green-carpet seekers who have sprayed, dug, replanted and watered their own small lawns by the successful or unavailing hour.

* * * *

It was an advertisement in The Berkshire Eagle about 15 years ago that brought Kiley and Tanglewood together. He was then informed that he might work up to the foreman's job.

Now 39 and superintendent for the past six years, Kiley says he had no particular qualifications for the job when he started. It is apparent that he has somehow acquired a fund of knowledge about lawns, carpentry, trees, even plumbing.

"Two years before I took on the superintendent's job, I couldn't grow anything," he says. A native of West Stockbridge and graduate of Williams High School in Stockbridge, Kiley in his pre-Tanglewood days had been in the Navy and done stints with General Electric and Massachusetts Electric.

* * * *

The fact that Kiley has grown a very green thumb is seen in the small, but efficient greenhouse built at Tanglewood on his urging. Now all the plants are grown there for the window boxes of geraniums, hanging baskets of fuscias and pots of begonias that decorate the grounds.

Kiley supervises the cutting of 27 acres of Tanglewood lawn. He is in charge when an addition is constructed to one of the buildings on the property. After every concert he and his staff painstakingly retrieve the refuse left by careless concert-goers.

A full catalogue of Kiley's activities would be virtually endless. The hours he puts in during the active season are long. "We're fighting the weather," he says. Berkshire County's autumn is short, and preparing the grounds for winter requires such things as boarding up the shed and concert halls, aerating the lawns to break up compaction, applying some four tons of fertilizer and a top dressing, trimming the hedges.

In the spring, which is also too brief to give Kiley any leeway, trees are planted, flowers started and again, the lawns readied, this time for people rather than snow.

* * * *

The Kileys live in a white shingle house near Tanglewood's main gate. Mrs. Kiley, the former Barbara Buckler of Stockbridge, and the two children, David, 9, and Linda, 4, also do their bit for the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

During the summer the whole family is mobilized to answer the telephone and redirect visitors who think the Kiley's home is in the public domain.

Tanglewood has always presented special difficulties for the Kileys, beyond the job itself. The children, for example, have to learn to sleep through the hours when evening concerts are over and hundreds of cars with lights and horns are leaving the nearby parking areas.

* * * *

One of Kiley's greatest triumphs was his unique solution to the problem of achieving a constant "just manicured" look to the many acres of lawn. Not satisfied with the streaked look of the lawns when cut by the conventional tractor method, Kiley designed a seven-foot boom arrangement with two cutting units. The boom is attached to the front of the tractor and cuts the grass before itis crushed by the machines' heavy wheels.

The lawns are cut twice a week. The job still takes 5½ hours, but because there is no crushed and hence uncut grass to pop up later, there are no streaks.

The Kileys were not classical music lovers when they came to Tanglewood. Through constant exposure to the BSO concerts, however, they are "learning to enjoy it," Mrs. Kiley says. They have even bought a number of classical recordings that they play when the orchestra has returned to Boston.

* * * *

Asked whether he enjoys his job, Kiley says that he takes great satisfaction in maintaining the estate as it was many years ago. Of his summer staff, he says, "they're expected to work seven days a week and as many hours as requested."

He expects as much of himself. Tanglewood is more than a job for Jim Kiley, it's a way of life.

ANN SHANAHAN, Stockbridge correspondent for The Eagle, is one of the lucky wives who has avoided even trying out the home lawnmower.

WEST ORANGE, N. J.
CHRONICLE
W. 5,300

AUG 6 1964

Violinist Invited To Write Paper

Samuel Applebaum, violinist of Maplewood, formerly of West Orange, has been invited by Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Richard Burgin, associate conductor, to write a paper on "the training and the development of a good foundation for young violinists and violists."

Applebaum is to discuss the handling of talented youngsters and the technical procedures to insure good progress. He will read his paper at Tanglewood Music Festival in Massachusetts August 17 at 2 p.m. for an audience, comprising visiting violin teachers and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A discussion by a panel will follow. Panel members will include Louis Persinger, Richard Burgin, Carleton Cooley, John Corigliano, Josef Gingold, Sydney Harth, Louis Krasner, Joseph Silverstein, Roman Totenberg and Eudice Shapiro. The whole program is made possible by a grant from the Martha Baird Rockefeller Foundation.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 417,165

AUG 2 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
JUL 12 1964

Tanglewood Cafeteria Busy at Intermission

Music Festival Operation Serves About 2000 in 20 Minutes; Corbitt Is Manager

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—At intermission time when applause for the Boston Symphony Orchestra drifts across the lawn and the lights in the great shed at Tanglewood go up, the cafeteria near the main gate drops its barriers and reopens for business.

Before the music starts for the second half of the concert 20 minutes later about 2000 eaters will have been served in six lines.

Tanglewood Specialty

They buy beverages, fruit, sandwiches, candy and pastry. The box lunches, which have been a Tanglewood specialty for about six years, are sold mostly to picnickers before the concert.

And when the music begins again, the cafeteria immediately closes because even though the orchestra could increase its cafeteria profits by selling food all during the concerts, it is not in the food business. It doesn't wish anything to interfere with the music.

Anyway, Samuel J. Corbitt says the cafeteria expects to sell 25,000 box lunches before the season ends Aug. 23.

Corbitt's full title is eastern regional supervisor of schools and special projects operations of Treadway Inns, Inc., a corporation which has operated the food concessions at Tanglewood since the early 40s when Corbitt was in Lee High School and, with five others, sold sandwiches and sodapop at Tanglewood through the windows of a school bus.

Large Staff

Now and for the last half-dozen years the company has operated the cafeteria with a 25-member staff; a manager, assistant manager, chef, second cook, baker, 14 college boys and six cashiers.

Their job includes preparation of 250 to 275 lunches five days a week for members, faculty and staff on the Berkshire Music Center as well as members and staff of the orchestra who don't go home to nearby cottages.

For them lunch is served from 12 to 1.30 p. m. Available is a choice of hot plate, two salad plates, four sandwich plates and the average price is 75 to 95 cents. Coffee and pastry are available between 10 a. m. and 2.30 p. m.

The box-lunch service for concert goers, however, is unusual. It was started in 1958 after a dozen years of experiments with menus involving such things as hot meals and sandwiches made to order.

1000 Per Hour

Patrons have a choice of three boxes — turkey, roast beef, broiled half chicken—and can be sure that the contents of each box was prepared at the cafeteria and packed on the morning of the day of purchase.

The number of boxes packed (the youthful assembly line can pack 1000 in an hour) is determined by the number sold on the comparitive day the preceding year—raised or lowered according to the weather.

Average sale is 400 Friday evening, 500 at the Saturday morning open rehearsal, 1200 Saturday evening and 1500 Sunday afternoon.

But even the box lunches are out-sold by Tanglewood's brownies — best sellers according to Corbitt. He says the cafeteria will sell 65,000 this season.

Various reasons are offered to explain their success. One offered by an independent, objective customer is that they are "short on sugar."

"They are not too sweet," he says. "They don't taste like nuttie goodie fudge."

Musical Events

TODAY

2.30: Boston Symphony Orchestra; Tanglewood, Lenox.
2.30: Band concert; Forest Park.
3: Chamber music; Marlboro School of Music, Marlboro, Vt.
3.30: Chamber music; Cummington School of the Arts.
7.30: Band concert; Szot Park, Chicopee.
8: Hartt String Quartet; Millard Auditorium, University of Hartford.
8.30: Pete Seeger; Music Barn, Lenox.

MONDAY

8.30: "I Married an Angel"; Storrowton Music Fair, West Springfield. (All week)
8.30: "Connecticut Yankee"; Goodspeed Opera House, East Haddam, Conn. (All week)

TUESDAY

8: Harvard Glee Club & Radcliffe Choral Society; Theater, Tanglewood, Lenox.

THURSDAY

8: Band Concert; Ware.
9: Hartford Summer Symphony; Constitution Plaza, Hartford.

FRIDAY

8: Boston Symphony Orchestra; Tanglewood, Lenox.
8.30: Chamber music; Yale School of Music, Norfolk, Conn.
8.30: Chamber music; Marlboro School of Music, Marlboro, Vt.

SATURDAY

3.30: Olatunji; Music Barn, Lenox.
8: Boston Symphony Orchestra; Tanglewood, Lenox.
8.30: Chamber opera; Yale School of Music, Norfolk, Conn.
8.30: Chamber music; Marlboro School of Music, Marlboro, Vt.

NEXT SUNDAY

2.30: Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, guest conductor; Tanglewood, Lenox.
2.30: Band concert; Forest Park.
3: Chamber music; Marlboro School of Music, Marlboro, Vt.
3.30: Chamber music; Cummington School of the Arts.
7.30: Band concert; Szot Park, Chicopee.
8: Hartt String Quartet; Millard Auditorium, University of Hartford.
8.30: Lionel Hampton; Music Barn, Lenox.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SOUTHBRIDGE, Mass.
Circ. 5,212
JUL 30 1964

Tanglewood Program Aug. 19 To Benefit Music Center

By IRENE JARRY
News Music Columnist

Have you been to Tanglewood yet? It is a summer must if you like music. The Berkshire Festival is considered the best in America and is on as high an artistic level as any in Europe.

The final of the week end series will begin on Saturday, Aug. 22.

Besides having the best and most varied music America can offer, it is known for its marvelous scenic country setting. Tanglewood has hundreds of acres of beautiful lawn, gardens, great trees, and lake shore and has been the summer home of the Boston Symphony for many years.

Best Composers

It is there that the principals of the orchestra, together with a distinguished faculty including some of the best composers of America and Europe, hold the annual session of the Berkshire Music Center, a school for "living and working in music". New composers and compositions are born here. They have a large choral group, forums, chamber music, opera, and every other type of musical activity. It is the final roster for talent, One encounters artists, actors, writers, and personalities.

There will be a Gala evening Aug. 19. The program will benefit the Student Music Center and will consist of several events beginning in mid-afternoon which will represent all departments of the Music Center. The highlight of the day will be the evening concert in the Music Shed at which the full Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras will combine forces to form an orchestra of 170 musicians. The giant orchestra will also be joined during the concert by a 200 voice chorus and will be conducted consecutively by Erich Leinsdorf and Leopold Stokowski.

There is chamber music the first three evenings of the week in the Chamber Music Hall. Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon the full orchestra performs in the Music Shed. There are open rehearsals every Saturday morning at 10. Rehearsals are fascinating and are sometimes more rewarding musically than the finished concert.

The public is invited to visit the school with its varied departments and the music store with many unusual scores and books.

Tanglewood also has a literary and historical meaning. It was the meeting place of Emerson, Holmes, Melville, and Hawthorne. The latter lived here in 1850; it was here that he wrote "The House of Seven Gables" and first imagined his "Tanglewood Tales". The "Little Red House" in which he lived and worked has been rebuilt in replica.

This year they are especially celebrating the anniversary of Richard Strauss and one of his works is included in almost every week end concert. Excerpts from his masterpiece, "Der Rosenkavalier", will be played Sunday. On Aug. 9 George Bolet, the pianist, will be soloist in Strauss' "Parergon". The following week Lorin Hollander will be the soloist in "Burleske". Strauss' music nearly always has a poetic program, and one of my favorite tone-poems is his "Death and Transfiguration", which will be played along with other works Aug. 21.

Incidentally, the Boston Festival is still going strong. This week end, July 30 and August 1, is featuring the Hungarian Ballet and on Aug. 2 and 3 the Ballet Espanol Ximeney-Vargas will perform.

Happy listening!

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
JUN 29 1964

Whitestone

NEW SEXTET playing at Tanglewood this season will be this uniformed group from Pinkerton's National Detective Agency, which will patrol the grounds on a round-the-clock basis. Thomas D. Perry Jr., in dark coat, Boston Symphony Orchestra manager, discusses the patrol schedule with J. C. Bearden, supervisor of security, center, and James Kiley, Tanglewood superintendent. The Pinkerton men, left to right, are Sgt. Francis Hogan, Jeffrey Clark, David Mercaldo, Peter Brazeau, Lt. George Loucks and Sgt. Gordon Mizener.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304
AUG 27 1964

183

Notes and Footnotes

IT WAS an endurance contest last weekend at Tanglewood, and the final programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is not put forward disparagingly. It refers to Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn player for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who retired after 46 years at the close of the season Sunday afternoon.

As pointed out in a piece about him by Lisa Lansing in last week's "Berkshire Week" supplement of The Eagle, Mr. Speyer hasn't missed a concert in his long tenure with the BSO. With disarming frankness, he told the reporter, "and I'm not proud of it. When one is sick, one ought to stay at home."

Evidently, Mr. S didn't really mean that, or he certainly would have stayed home for the season's last two concerts. They were both big, demanding programs. Sunday there were the "Fidelio" overture, Symphony No. 7 of Beethoven, and "Ein Heldenleben," by Richard Strauss.

—Saturday night, Director Erich Leinsdorf led his musicians through Wagner's musical tidal wave, the "Valkyrie," and Verdi's "Requiem," plus accompaniment for Wotan's "Farewell," sung by Ezio Flagello. It was awful. At least, it was for Mr. Speyer, on the last lap of his BSO career.

He was tooting and blowing but his cheeks, with an ulcerated tooth.

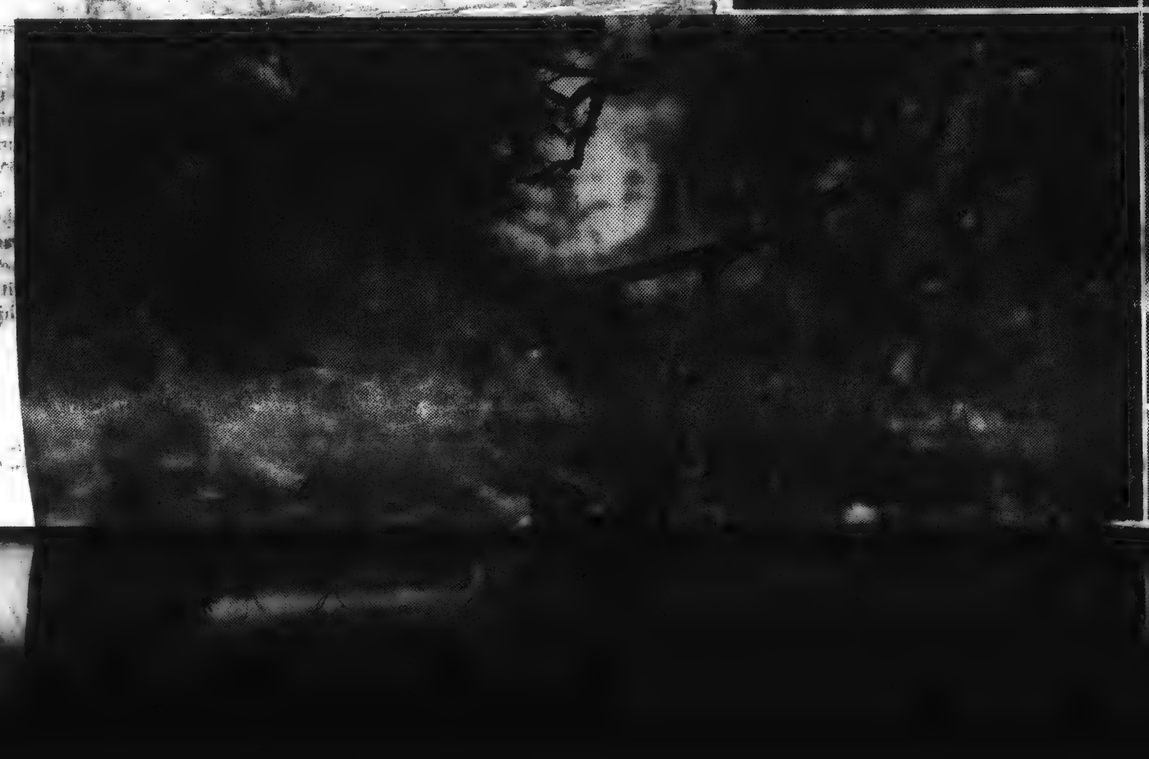
After Sunday's concert, he confided to one of our colleagues that he liked the "Berkshire Week" story, but added that he felt it was published just in time. Pointing to the swelling in his right cheek, he said the tooth started to tune up on Saturday, and for a time it looked as if his perfect attendance record was doomed.

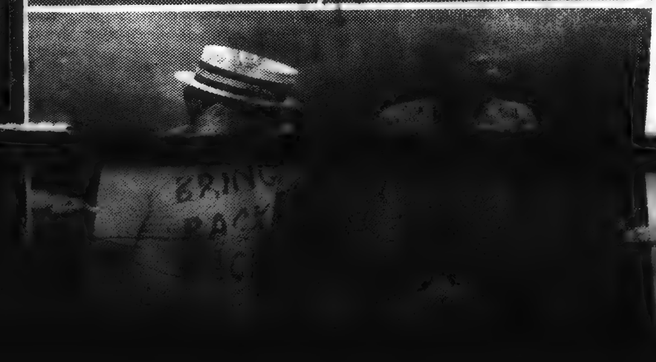
Such a tooth infection for a wind musician could make it impossible for him to play, however strong his determination. Well, he made out, his record was unblemished, but he had to eat his words about staying home when sick.

Herald Tribune
D. 282,005 SUN. 363,384

JUL 1 2 1964

Blanket Rules For Concert Dress





By Louise Sweeney

"We would be pleased if all Tanglewood patrons would attend the concerts in appropriate concert dress," sighed the Berkshire Festival in a recent news release.

Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has long been a mecca for music lovers. A look at clothes worn there on a typical week end this summer raises the question: what is appropriate concert dress? In the music shed at Tanglewood people wear everything from pleated white linen to plaid sleeping bags. Outside, where listeners go grassing on the lawn, anything is worn as long as it's with a blanket. Some long-hairs even wear their selves.

Berkshire natives ("borners") usually turn up in shirtdresses and cardigan sweaters. It's the tourists who treat Tanglewood like

TIGHT BINDING

Eagle 8/15

Whitestone

THREE NOTED CONDUCTORS, all former students at Tanglewood, chat with Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky while at her home Seranak for the annual meeting of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. From left are Seiji Ozawa, Lukas Foss, Mrs. Koussevitzky, and Leonard Bernstein. Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Tanglewood Music Shed for the first time tomorrow afternoon. Foss and Bernstein are on the board of the foundation.

photos by William S. Tasnie

Blankets are the most important accessory at Tanglewood. 1. Rose Fensterheim, the Bronx, goes blanketing in pleated white tennis dress. 2. Adrienne Lichtig, Jamaica, wraps a green blanket cerape-style over orange slacks. 3. Phyllis Kerman, Manhattan, wears an afghan over roman-striped blouse. 4. Manhattan's Letty Pogrebin wears a Thomas white linen shift, green-fringed. 5. Tanglewood sandals go to any length. 6. Barbara Grossman, Manhattan, in red calico smock. 7. Loving couple under Tanglewood pines. 8. Tanglewood dropped its customary Bach week end this year, so Mr. and Mrs. Benson D. Scotch, Union, N. J., crusade in Bring Back Bach tee shirts.

Tanglewood draws a small minority which carries transistor radios to cater to the Mets and considers Mozart good music to play bridge by. 9. This tourist in blue jeans, rollers, and chartreuse scarf is painting her toenails to a Haydn cantata. 10. Julia Sternscheim, Manhattan, wears a pleated white linen dress, lace-edged, from the Phoenix Shop. 11. Berets are popular with men at Tanglewood: Maxwell E. Foster, Ipswich, Mass., wears a brown beret, tweed suit; his wife wears a cool print.

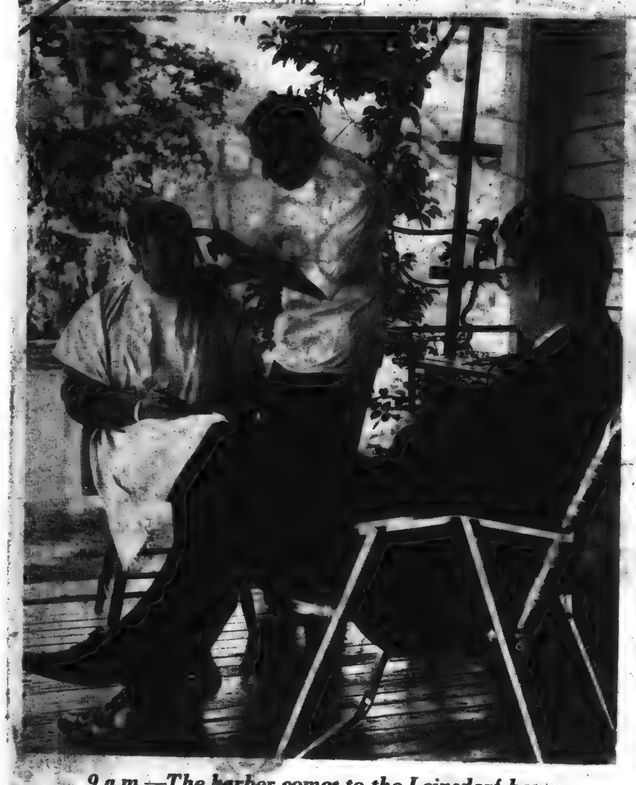
Berkshire natives ("born-ers") usually turn up in shirtdresses and cardigan sweaters. It's the tourists who treat Tanglewood like a beach who first raised the appropriate dress problem. "We're trying to discourage short shorts and people who come in wearing clothes but wind up wearing bathing suits," says Tanglewood press and public relations director Sanford R. Sistair.

Tanglewood has been battling the increasingly casual summer crowd for years now. Up until ten years ago the management handed out wraparound skirts to scantily dressed women. As recently as two years ago ushers were still reminding men to keep their shirts on.

Tanglewood fans have always been rugged individualists, as these photographs prove. It may take a while to decide whether Bring Back Bach tee shirts are "appropriate concert dress."

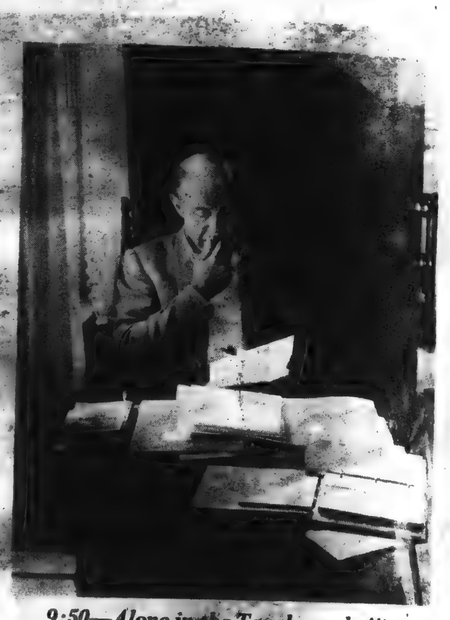
TIGHT BINDING

Box 378, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 1 1964



9 a.m.—The barber comes to the Leinsdorf home.

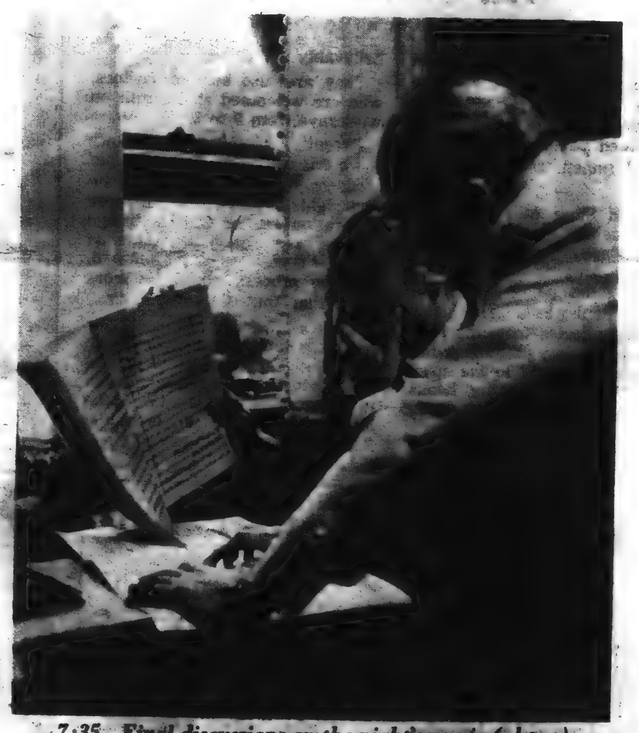
9:20—Breakfast with Mrs. Leinsdorf.



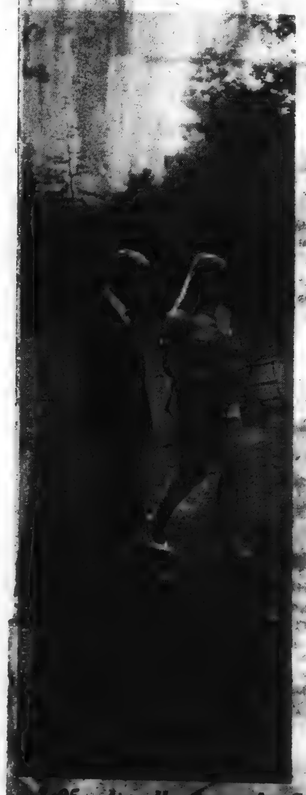
9:50—Alone in the Tanglewood office.

A Day With Leinsdorf

6:45—Relaxing at the piano before the concert.



7:35—Final discussions on the night's music (above) take place in the office; 7:55—the music director dons his jacket.



8:05—A walk around the Stockbridge grounds with his daughter precedes the conductor's departure for Tanglewood about 7:15.

WHEN THE GENERAL PUBLIC sees Erich Leinsdorf, he's nearly always conducting the Boston Symphony; when those who belong to Tanglewood see him, he may be doing any one of a myriad of things, all of them facets of his roles as music director of the orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center.

In not quite two full summers in Lenox, Leinsdorf has already created a name for himself as a man who keeps his expressive fingers in all the various pies, rather than just the musical affairs of the orchestra.

A typical day with the summer-active Leinsdorf runs the gamut from morning haircut to post-concert autographs and makes stops along the 13-

Photos by

TIGHT BINDING

sdorf

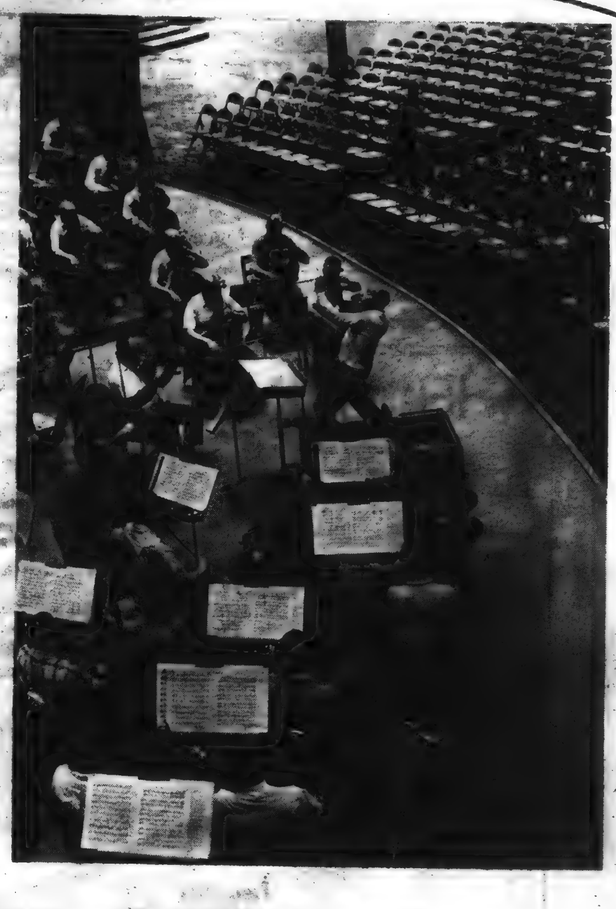
WHEN THE GENERAL PUBLIC sees Erich Leinsdorf, he's nearly always conducting the Boston Symphony; when those who belong to Tanglewood see him, he may be doing one of a myriad of things, all of them facets of his roles as music director of the orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center.

In not quite two full summers in office, Leinsdorf has already created a name for himself as a man who puts his expressive fingers in all the various pies, rather than just the musical affairs of the orchestra.

A typical day with the summertime Leinsdorf runs the gamut from a morning haircut to post-concert autographs and makeup stops along the 13-hour way at the office, student activities, orchestra rehearsals, piano, dressing room and concert stage. The day also brings considerable shuttling back and forth from the Leinsdorf home in Stockbridge to Tanglewood.

Throughout a day that a bystander would find harassing by its mere multiplicity, Leinsdorf remains composed, controlled, gracious. He relishes all conversations—in French, German or English— listens well to each comer and sorts out the flow of problems and people into quick and final decisions.

About 10—Rehearsal with students (above) or with the Boston Symphony, until 12:30.



4 p.m.—A home meeting with Thomas D. Perry, orchestra manager.

10:15—Conductor meets public backstage.

8—The day reaches its climax as Leinsdorf presents the orchestra to the public.

Photos by Joel Librizzi Text by Ruth Bass

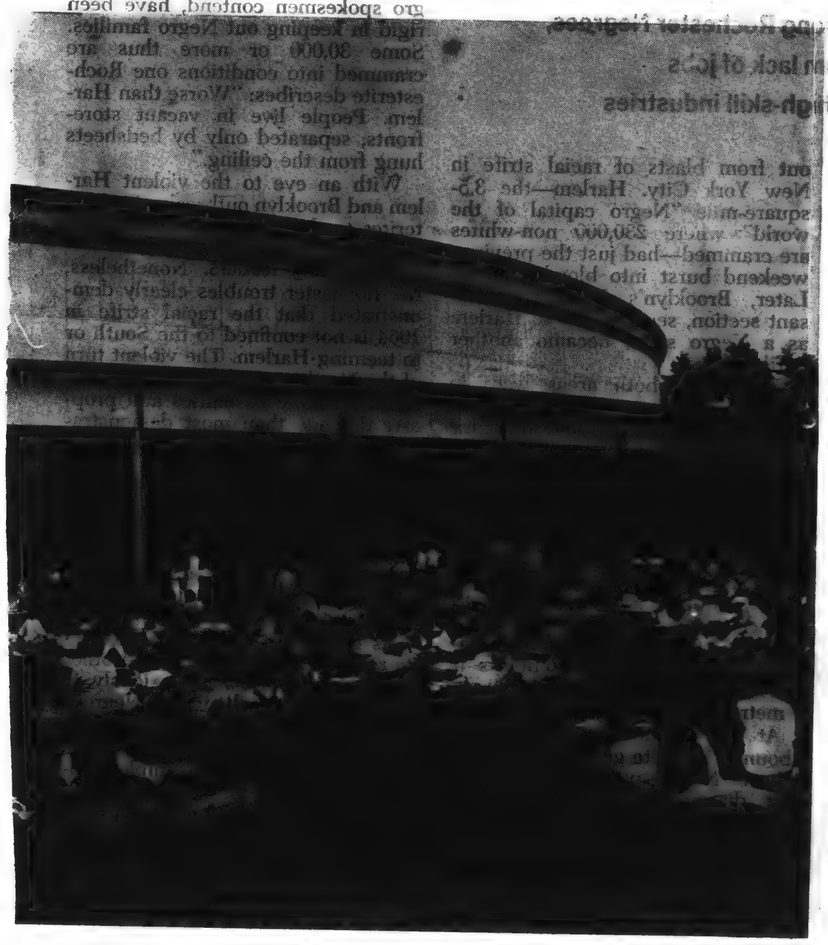
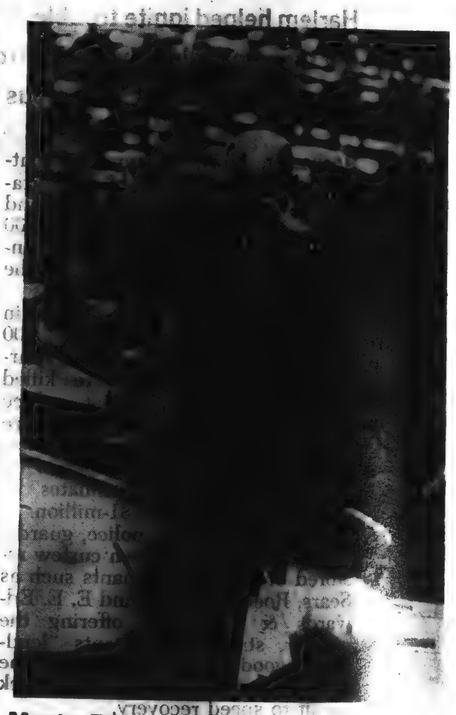
BUSINESS WEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 401,800

AUG 1 1964

Not all music at Tanglewood is long-haired; a student orchestra rehearses jazz written especially for it. Most of the students, from all over the country, are on scholarship. The others pay a small tuition and boarding fee.

Away from din raised by 300 student musicians all going own way, a singer finds a quiet studio for practice.





Maestro Erich Leinsdorf leads his men through a difficult passage prior to performance set for that evening.

At concerts (left), some like seats in "shed," others the cheaper, more informal way of lounging on grass.

More than an orchestra

For music, not money

Boston Symphony, running summer school as well as Tanglewood, winds up in red; but long season makes it closer to breaking even than most big orchestras first 35 years of its existence, its of the Boston Symphony a were made up entirely by ler, Major Henry Lee Hig- a marvelously proper Proper an who could become quite nt at the notion his burden should be shared. "Charge it, if there be any to profit forget the loss," he used to ct the orchestra's manager, it does not really exist."

day, the BSO is big business, ring some $3-million a year. Part of this money is made up by the contributions of 4,000 to 5,000 donors —the "friends of the symphony"— yet the world-renowned orchestra still doesn't make ends meet. It is more concerned about music than money—as its summertime activities clearly demonstrate.

More than concerts. During the warm summer days of July and August it is not unusual for visitors to the orchestra's 210-acre summer home in the Berkshire Hills to come across student musicians practicing, their music precariously balanced in the branches of trees.

For Tanglewood is more than an outdoor concert hall. It is a school largely supported by the orchestra and devoted to the concept that musicianship in the future must be maintained at the same degree of excellence as in the past.

Thus, during the day the entire estate seems to burst with sound—choral, orchestral, operatic, and instrumental. At night, though, everything is stilled except the one performance of the evening, be it the BSO's weekend concert, a concert by the full-size student orchestra, or a chamber music recital. These are what draw the crowds over the narrow back roads around Lenox, Mass.

Footing the bill. Although these crowds pay some $500,000 each year for tickets during the eight-week Tanglewood season, and contribute additional thousands to the Berkshire Music Center, as the school is called, the combined operation is a financial loss. The big winners in dollars are the Berkshire County motels, hotels, and restaurants. Last year, visitors to Tanglewood spent an estimated $3.5-million to $4-million outside the grounds.

No major symphony orchestra in the country can support itself on box office revenues, record royalties, and radio and TV concerts. But the Boston comes closer than most, despite its summer school, most of whose students come on scholarships.

A key reason is that the orchestra has the longest season of any similar group. From October through April it plays its regular concert season in Boston's Symphony Hall and on tour. Then, minus its top-ranking first desk men, it becomes for nine weeks the Boston Pops Orchestra, with a lighter repertory.

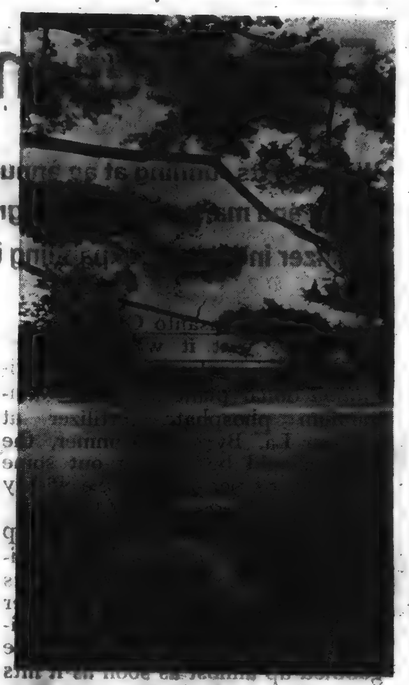
Next comes the two-week Esplanade season on the Boston bank of the Charles River. This is free to the public, and a dead loss, though of late some of the larger Boston-based companies such as Gillette have sponsored "evenings."

Finally, there is the Tanglewood season, first with a chamber orchestra made up of the first desk men who double as the Music Center's faculty, and then with the full orchestra for six weeks.

Overtones. With some of the highest salaries in the symphonic "industry," the BSO enjoys a remarkably low personnel turnover. Having played together so long as a group is certainly one reason for the orchestra's brilliance. And because of its excellence and renown, the BSO is in frequent demand for recording sessions, thereby further enhancing its income and that of its members.

But this is not the entire answer; there is the matter of pride. After Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's new music director, had conducted his first concert almost two years ago, he was asked what he thought of the musicians.

"They have the whitest vests I've ever seen," was his reaction. By this he meant that Boston Symphony musicians appear to take as much pride in their jobs as Bostonians do in their performance.



Cellist Hideo Yashiro from Tokyo's Nippon Chamber Symphony Orchestra practices in the shade of a tree.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

AUG 9 1964

Composer Berger: "I feel very free here."

Tanglewood Is a Study Center as Well as a Festival

LENOX, Mass.

By THEODORE STRONGIN

"I WISH other people would talk about my music rather than myself," said Arthur Berger. Nevertheless he did talk, which is fortunate, because Mr. Berger has special qualifications.

This summer he is composer-in-residence at the Berkshire Music Center (the school of Tanglewood) replacing the indisposed Pierre Boulez. Otherwise, he is Naumburg Professor of Music at Brandeis University. Born in New York in 1912, he has been a critic on The New York Sun and The New York Herald Tribune, and has edited the scholarly magazine, "Perspectives of New Music," to which he still contributes.

And so as a teacher and critic, his talk, as well as his music, has the authority of experience. It is an authority he does not belabor. Mr. Berger is modest, soft-spoken and his statements are explorations rather than pronouncements.

He is not a member of the two most-talked-of and most fashionable groups today, the random composers and the electronic composers. The random composers are the ones who leave many more choices to the performer to make as he goes along than are traditional to concert music. "My objection," Mr. Berger said, "is that I don't see how I can sufficiently rely on a performer as my fellow composer." Even in jazz, "not all jam sessions are in the groove. There's so much music that one has a great responsibility to the public.

*

"I use serial-12 tone systems as points of reference. I first played around with 12-tone in 1933, but at the time I couldn't get away from the gestures of Viennese music then built into it (it had been originated by Schoenberg in Vienna). Now it's a system and no longer a style."

But Mr. Berger is quick to point out that he doesn't exclude the random composer. "They have some answers," he said. "They have to think about them. They still have to explain many things." He does not rule out random music in theory, just as he does not rule out the possibility of new, imaginative work in any guise, past or present.

But random music is not for him, personally. He has already gone through one great change, to 12-tone and serialism. As to another revolutionary change to random or electronic, "How many times in a lifetime is one required to come to terms," he said.

*

Mr. Berger does object to the people, random or otherwise, who make you feel that if you're not doing everything just their way, you're not "in it." He will soon be facing composers who, presumably, are "in it." Starting tomorrow, Tanglewood will be the scene for six days of a music and conversation festival within a festival focussed on the works of 10 young Americans, each of whom has written music for the occasion. There will be meetings in which Mr. Berger will take part along with the rest of the center's composing staff. Each of the 10 will discuss his own viewpoint. Music by Mr. Berger and others on the staff will be heard along with the works of the ten.

"The young people don't listen to my music," said Mr. Berger. "They are not interested in two-thirds of my total output. Something's going on. Somebody in electronic music in Europe said that he's not interested in any composer over 40."

On the other hand, "I think that a lot of music composed in the nondescript, traditional-sounding idiom is that way not because the idiom isn't good, but maybe for some reason there's not enough challenge in it."

*

"I'm willing to change my mind, though—just as I am about the random people. It's just that from my point of view, the old tonality ways are finished. There's not enough challenge and they can't be free enough."

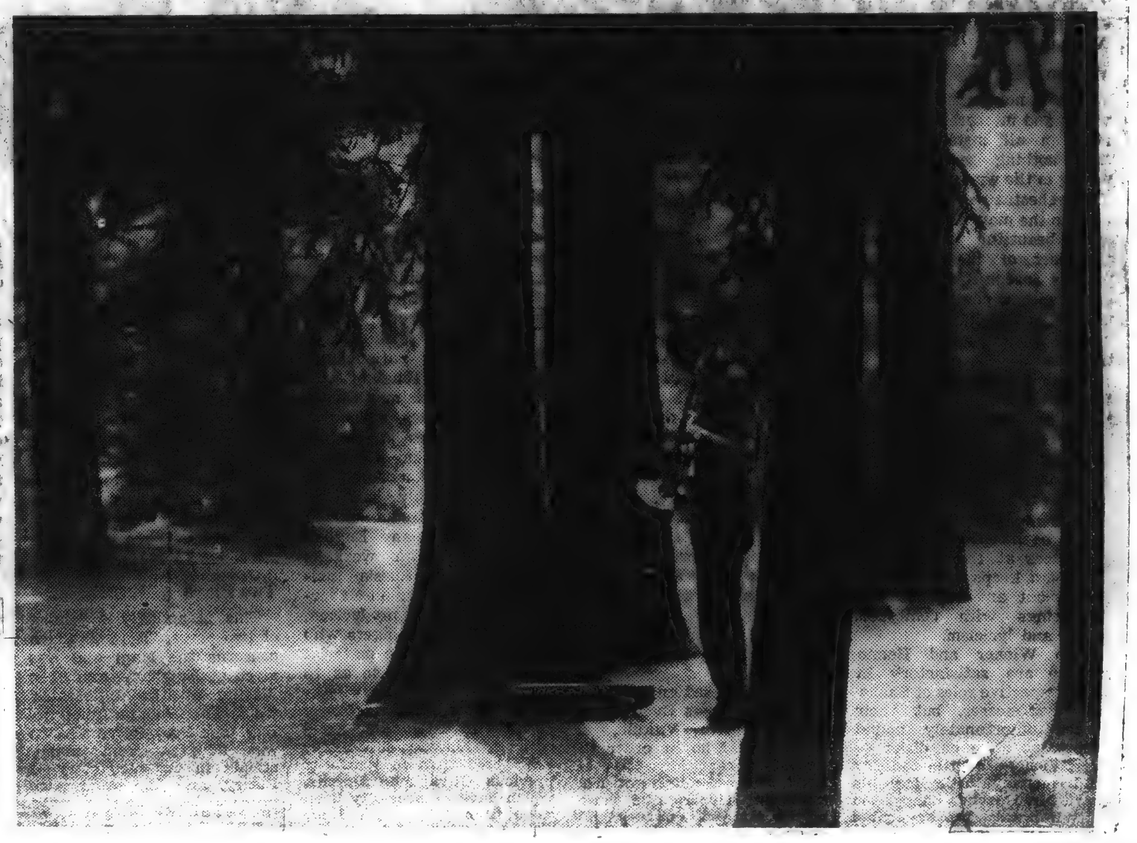
Mr. Berger composes mostly in the summer, when school is out. At Tanglewood, he is staying at Seranak, the estate of Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the conductor. Mr. Berger's room has a sweeping view down a valley to a lake surrounded by the Berkshires. "I feel very free here," he said.

Does he miss the life of a music critic? "That's a difficult question," he said. "You have to get in a very special state of mind to be on the spot and topical. I would rather be reflective. I was the sort of person who always worried terribly if I made a mistake."

Now he prefers the academic life, especially at Brandeis. "It's wonderful to be in a place where composing, where creative things in music—in the arts in general—mean so much. Universities are doing a great deal for composers by giving them a place."

Hanson Carroll

Frances Wait, above, a flute student at the Berkshire Music Center is one of many talented young musicians who flock to Tanglewood for the eight-week session of study and music-making. Although instruction is given in classrooms, a student (right) finds a secluded spot for practicing among the tall timber on the estate.



New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 1964

191

A Day With Leinsdorf
In Photos

ON THE COVER—A view of the Boston Symphony [illegible] is caught by Photographer Joel Librizzi from a vantage point above the acoustical panels, or "black bats" as they're called at Tanglewood. Panels created the triangular blackouts in the photo; more views of Leinsdorf appear on Pages [illegible].

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
AUG 6 1964

Whitestone

BERKSHIRE CAMPERS meet with Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Gian Carlo Menotti, right, whose "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi" will be performed at Tanglewood Saturday with a chorus of children from camps in the county. The work is based on the children's Crusade to the Holy Land in 1212.

THE RICHMOND NEWS LEADER
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA
D. 123,051
AUG 27 1964

SPECIALLY TRAINED FOR POST

Symphony Hires First Manager

John E. Gibbens, 24, one of the country's few specially trained symphony orchestra managers, will become the first professional manager for the Richmond Symphony on September 1.

In the past, volunteers from the symphony board have performed the symphony's administrative functions. Although Gibbens' appointment is concurrent with an announcement of a symphony deficit of $5,314 for the past fiscal year, the scheduling is "a coincidence, but a happy coincidence," according to Edmund A. Rennolds Jr., symphony president.

Gibbens, a native of Twin Falls, Idaho, was one of five prospective symphony orchestra managers given Ford Foundation administrative intern grants last year. He received his training with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

This summer he was associated with the press and public relations department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its summer headquarters at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Whitestone Photo
JOHN E. GIBBENS

Gibbens attended Willamette University in Salem, Ore., and received a bachelor of music degree with major in cello from the University of Oregon.

He has played with the Portland Symphony Orchestra, and the University of Oregon Symphony Orchestra, which he also served as librarian.

He is a member of the Oregon Music Teachers Association, the Southern Oregon Philharmonic Society, the American Symphony Orchestra League, Inc., and Phi Mu Alpha Sinfonia, which he served as president.

He is married and has a son.

As I Hear It

Debut at 82

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

FOR SOME men "the 80s" means golf; for others, the heat; for still others, the market; for New Yorkers, it may refer to streets, east or west; and to some, "the 80s" refer to age.

Chauncey Depew used to tell of a Republican convention he attended in Chicago when the temperature was over 90, but he was the coolest man in the hall, he averred. He was only 86. Chauncey's ability as a raconteur increased as he crossed into the 90s. He was one of a famous trio of outstanding citizens born some 20 years or more before the Civil War, of whom the other two were Elihu Root and Joseph Choate. All of them lived and continued to assume huge responsibilities into the late years of their long lives.

* * *

OLD AGE itself is not an accomplishment. It is the tasks one achieves or the burdens one continues to bear which make octogenarians venerated. I remember a newspaper item some years ago which noted the passing of a centenarian. The only fact found newsworthy was that he had been held in his mother's arms while she stood on a Peoria curbstone one day when Abe Lincoln passed in a political parade.

In discussing men of patriarchal age, one thinks quickly of the late Pierre Monteux, who died but a month ago at 89. He had no thoughts of retiring. Indeed, he had plans for other things. He opined that, if and when declining strength and receding mental agility should oblige him to give up conducting, he would become a music critic. And Pablo Casals, at 87, while he yields gradually in his cello playing, gives way in no degree in his teaching and conducting.

* * *

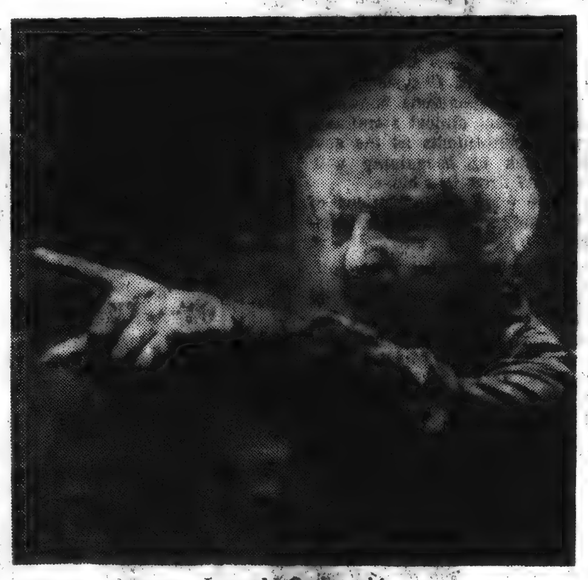
THIS YEAR we are observing the centennial of Richard Strauss, who died at 85, but who continued to compose right up to the last years. It would probably be an unpardonable omission at this point to fail to disinter the story about the student who arrived in Vienna only recently and asked for the address of Beethoven, adding that he came to take lessons with the master. The atonished look on the face of the man he addressed caused him to ask: "Why, isn't he still composing?" The answer of course, was "No, he is decomposing."

Pascal is credited with having said, "Old age is that period of life most remote from infancy." How lucky it is in the case of gifted men, to say nothing of the vast majority of the rest of us not so blessed, that the end of their productive lives is so far from infancy.

* * *

MUSIC affords phenomenal and tragic examples of incredibly endowed prodigies whose lives were cut short in calendar maturity. Witness Mozart, Schubert, Chopin and others of that elite. On the other hand, there is a list of men who were granted spans well beyond the traditional three score and ten who were privileged to work and participate in the performance of music well into their 80s.

Outside of music, one quickly thinks of men like Adenauer, Schweitzer and Churchill. Within music there was another triumvirate soon after World War II: Toscanini, Koussevitzky and Stokowski, who unofficially dominated the field and who were generally conceded to be the reigning monarchs of their profession. The first two have departed, but Stokowski still continues actively in his 82nd year. This coming Wednesday, the 19th, he will appear for a small part of the Tanglewood Gala program, but on Friday, the 21st, he will take over the entire evening. This is his Berkshire debut.



Leopold Stokowski

* * *

THE FIRST conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Georg Henschel, returned to Boston in 1931 to conduct the 50th anniversary concert, the exact program he had conducted when, at the age of 31, he organized the orchestra under the aegis of Major Higginson.

Stokowski has always been a man of striking appearance and of outstanding achievements. Tall, with bushy hair, once blond but long since white within the memory of many not-so-young music lovers, his posture is still vigorously erect if his gait is not quite so sprightly. Born in London of Polish and Irish parentage, he adopted the name of Stokes in 1905 after a few years as organist at St. James', Piecadilly. He came to New York as an organist, but became a conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony in 1909. In 1912 he went to the Philadelphia Orchestra, where he remained 30 years. He made the orchestra one of the foremost in America. He reverted to his original appellation as conductor in America.

* * *

HE WAS a pioneer in new music, and when audience hisses greeted some of the advanced works he performed, he did not hesitate to lecture and reprimand them. This did not affect his popularity adversely. He was an experimentor in acoustics, orchestral stage dispositions, radio and recording, as well as in the movies. In 1940 he organized the All-American Youth Orchestra, consisting of players between 15 and 25, and took it to South America. Some of the members of that orchestra received training which enabled them to enter more permanent orchestras. Several members of that Youth Orchestra now sit in the Boston Symphony.

Stokowski organized another orchestra in New York only last year, which he called the American Symphony and for which he gave first consideration to musicians of the age which had been the limits in the first Youth Orchestra. He has not deigned it time to retire to a less strenuous situation, but has continued to take on tasks of his own choosing and of great significance. Our own Leinsdorf, a much younger man, to be sure, is such a man, seeking duties in addition to those of his own orchestra. Koussevitzky was also a prime example of such an urge and drive, as witness the school which he founded at Tanglewood and the publishing ventures he favored to encourage composers and to extend the dissemination of music beyond the confines in which he found it when he came into prominence.

* * *

A SOLOIST has his immediate reward; a composer must wait for approval by slower methods. A painter or a sculptor gets no immediate applause at an exhibition. Conductors, able ones, that is, probably are the most quickly and most often recompensed for their efforts. One would sometimes think that the composer and the performer were very inconsequential parts of a triumph on stage. The conductor may protest by inviting his men to stand and by gesture indicate that it is they who deserve the appreciation, but the public is more pleased to adore the men who hold a baton, or, as in the case of Stokowski and Leinsdorf, direct without one.

* * *

THE FAME of a conductor, however, is volatile and ephemeral. Toscanini becomes a lengend with a vanishing luster as years go by. Koussevitzky's fame was based on more solid plans for the future, and his name retains its radiance because of his extra interests and accomplishments. Stokowski has applied his talents to the transcription of music of earlier centuries, notably Bach. This, in addition to his position in music in general, makes his coming appearances a keenly anticipated event.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 333,636 S. 377,788

AUG 9 1964

Cliburn a Hit at Tanglewood

THE MAMMOTH MUSIC SHED at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., is the site of the main concerts at the Berkshire Music festival. Good acoustics permit the concerts to be heard by large crowds on the lawn outside.

By Joseph Kaye.
(The Star's New York Correspondent.)

LENOX, MASS. — In one week of the Berkshire Music festival at Tanglewood, two concerts, as different from each other as the poles, brought the largest audiences. One, with pianist Van Cliburn, drew 14,592 listeners, and the other by the Boston Pops orchestra, with comedian Allan Sherman in a musical parody as the main attraction, drew 13,327 to the box office.

By contrast, the opening of the Boston Symphony orchestra series had an audience of only 5,000, and the weather was perfect. No one at Tanglewood tries to account for these facts, but there is no evading the basic principle that stars and novelties are audience magnets.

Van Cliburn has not changed much in appearance — except that his hair is shorter — since he returned from the 1958 Russian Tchaikovsky competition as the pianistic hero of his generation.

BUT HE HAS changed artistically. As a pianist he has matured into a sensitive and thoughtful performer, and he is advancing into related fields of music.

Before his concert he chatted with this correspondent.

"I have done some composing," he said. "Long ago I set the 123rd Psalm, and it has been performed at the Riverside church in New York. I do want to continue composing. How I would like to write a piano quartet! It would be wonderful!"

As he said this his eyes looked upward in that entranced expression that sometimes overcomes him at the piano.

Asked about his recent interest in conducting, he said, surprisingly enough, that he wants to conduct principally to better himself as a pianist.

"I conduct now only to educate myself," he said. "It's fantastic how much conducting is related to the piano. The more I learn about conducting the more I become educated as a pianist."

HOWEVER, when he tours the Soviet Union next year he will do some formidable conducting — seemingly far beyond a self-educating project. He says he will conduct Rachmaninov's "The Bells," a choral symphony, and the Prokofiév cantata, "Alexander Nevsky."

Cliburn said that he also anticipates opera conducting:

"When I'm old — say about 25 years from now — and I've gained the knowledge," he said, "I want to conduct Wagner and Strauss, perhaps also Verdi. I would like to conduct 'Tristan' and 'Die Meistersinger' and 'Elektra' — expecially Strauss's 'Elektra.'"

Having said this, Cliburn went backstage to practice some scales and then proceeded to the huge stage of the great Tanglewood music shed, where the main concerts are given, to play the Brahms Concerto No. 1 with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

Whitestone

DINNER AT THE WHITE HOUSE was the destination of Erich Leinsdorf yesterday afternoon when he left Pittsfield Airport in this Piper Aztec for Washington. Mr. Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was flown back to Pittsfield after the dinner. He made the trip with his two daughters.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4300

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

AUG 7 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 144,855
AUG 11 1964

Musical Chairs

Bats at Tanglewood, Met at the Stadium

By MARGO MILLER

There are two kinds of bats at Tanglewood. The common, attic variety are encouraged, each Spring, by Jim Kiley's maintenance crew to leave the premises before the start of the Boston Symphony season. The other, and desirable, "bats" are the 60 giant plywood triangles which, suspended over the stage of the Music Shed, provide the handsome acoustic canopy.

Five years ago, Mrs. Edmund Hawes Talbot of Brookline, gave $40,000 to design and put up the canopy. It replaced the white, box-like structure in which the orchestra had played since the beginning of the Berkshire Festival in 1938. Mrs. Talbot's gift was in memory of her husband.

The sum also took care of the construction of the pleated, permanent wooden wall surrounding the musicians, and a smaller, movable wall to project the sound of the chamber orchestra for the Bach-Mozart concerts which traditionally open the festival season. Charles Munch, then the Boston Symphony conductor, had also given $10,000 toward the shell and canopy.

The structure was designed by Warren Platner of Eero Saarinen and Associates. The acoustical adviser was the Cambridge firm of Bolt, Beranek and Newman. One of their tools was a sculpted head of a man with a microphone in each year. He was attended at each concert and rehearsal by a B.B.N. engineer.

Now Mrs. Talbot has matched her original gift with another, a trust fund for the upkeep of the canopy.

Met at Stadium

A New York institution—the Summer-long Lewisohn Stadium concerts—now becomes a page in musical history. For 47 years musicians of the New York Philharmonic were engaged by Mrs. Charles S. Guggenheimer to play programs of classical music, opera excerpts and show tunes.

Minnie Guggenheimer, now 82, organized the first concert in the stadium given by Adolph Lewisohn to the City College of New York. On June 23, 1918, the Metropolitan Opera Chorus and Anna Fitzhugh, soprano, sang a concert performance of "Cavaleria Rusticana" for returning World War I servicemen.

Mrs. Guggenheimer was usually on hand to welcome audiences and introduce the programs in her breezy manner. About 300,000 persons used to attend the six-week series in the 20,000-seat stadium at 137th st. and Convent av., in Harlem. After 1951, attendance fell off to about 135,000.

Mrs. Guggenheimer attributed the decline to the development of long-playing records and high-fidelity equipment in the home.

Saturday evening at the stadium's 17th annual Rodgers and Hammerstein program, program, an audience of 10,500 paged the series founder. "We want Minnie," they chanted. They got instead a short speech by Mrs. Guggenheimer's daughter, Mrs. Sophie G. Untermeyer.

The stadium concerts will go on, she told the crowd. The musical tenant will be the Metropolitan Opera.

The end of the Guggenheimer-Philharmonic Association was written in the orchestra's new contract with the New York Philharmonic Society for 52-weeks employment. The orchestra's future Summer plans have not yet been announced, though there is speculation that the air-conditioned Philharmonic Hall would be just the spot for a Summer festival right in New York.

The Metropolitan Opera, on the other hand, doesn't move into its new house at Lincoln Center for another year or so. The seven-week Stadium season would up the employment of the opera orchestra, chorus and ballet—for like other musical organizations, they are intent on a full year's contract.

As in the past, the City of New York will subsidize tickets for students. The city will also redesign the stage, and install a new amplification system. Not even Rudolf Bing, the Met's general director, can do anything about the weather. But perhaps his first opera at the new stand will be "Cavaleria." On opening night in 1918, the Stadium audience included Enrico Caruso.

Travelers to the new attraction are reminded to enunciate carefully. The Met at the Stadium Lewisohn may well be interpreted by taxi drivers as the Mets at the Stadium Shea.

This last, says the Globe's sports columnist, Bud Collins, is also known as "Chez Shea."

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Sunday Herald
Sun. Circ. 281,586
AUG 23 1964

Robert Taylor's Notes

It's Commerce, Si; Art, Si, in Music At Tanglewood

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Finishing its season at Tanglewood this afternoon, The Boston Symphony Orchestra once more supplies its answer to a soap operatic but real question. Can an orchestra be a commercial success with out losing its immortal soul?

The answer will be, of course, a resounding 'yes' on all counts: commerce, si, art, si. Seemingly the orchestra and its management have found the key to resolve the disharmonies of the many and the few. A democratic esthetic has evolved in the Berkshires.

This being the case, perhaps Tanglewood and its policies ought to be considered exemplary. Instead, every now and then one hears rumblings of discontent. The latest, by Arthur Myers in July's Hi-Fi-Stereo Review, is admittedly an 'impertinent' view of Tanglewood, but his minority report reflects enough reality for consideration.

TANGLEWOOD, declares Mr. Myers, is a peculiarly Yankee melding of high-mindedness and the profit motif, "a marriage of the ethereal and the financial." He mentions the crowds, the traffic, the manners of the masses, but the operative phrase is his final sentence. "When you can gather in the high-brows, the middle-brows, and even a scattering of stray upper low-brows, at one fell swoop, you've got a soap that floats."

To the purist of music, the carnival environment of Tanglewood can often be trying. One sympathizes with both Mr. Myers—and the orchestra. It is no scandal for a cultural activity to strive for profit, nor does it seem so absurd to appeal to everyone; even so, the musically literate can't be expected to like it very much.

Mr. Myers states the reason succinctly. While we talk about the relationship of the 'public' to music, there are actually a number of publics. Tanglewood, through a myriad of factors, musical and otherwise, manages to attract all of them; and what is, relatively speaking, the preserve of a dedicated coterie, becomes in the summer the stamping ground of a score of groups, including people who regard music as aural wallpaper.

THIS SERVES a variety of purposes other than the box-office, however. The most important aspect of Tanglewood, although the concerts proper bulk large, is its Music School as Erich Leinsdorf fully realizes. The concerts not only serve to give year-round employment to highly-skilled musicians, but take music out of its specialized environment, the concert hall, into the world at large.

So in this sense, on a more serious plane, the function of Tanglewood is not too dissimilar from the Esplanade concerts of Mr. Fiedler. Rather than the audience, though, the programs are more open to criticism.

Generally, they are re-hashes of the winter's Symphony Hall bills. Now and then an important score receives a premiere or a musical novelty is introduced. Mr. Leinsdorf has been more industrious than his predecessors, injecting the element of fresh, new works into his repertoire, yet the programs as a rule repeat the format of the winter season in Boston.

I WOULD NOT have it otherwise, for it is too much to ask of a conductor that he work up a set of original programs, summer and winter. The handful of first-rank maestros in the world need less work, not more. It is the apprentice who requires training, not the experienced man who is too often driven so hard as to be separated from the subconscious sources of inspiration. The programs at Tanglewood seem to me ideally suited to the ends of consumption.

In music, as in most other arts of our society, consumption has become an aim in itself. The pride with which attendance figures are flourished indicates the emphasis on this. At Tanglewood consumption of music, with all its attendant deficiencies, is painfully evident; but at the same time The Berkshire Festival gives fair weight to the buyer and may even inspire the performing artist through a change of scene, a hiatus, a musical vacation in the fullest sense that it just may bring one closer to music.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,193
AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Mercury (e)
MEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 7,823
AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 48,932
AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Ledger-Times
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 12,500
AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Enterprise & Times (e)
BROCKTON, Mass.
Circ. 47,397
AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,565
AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald News (e)
FALL RIVER, Mass.
Circ. 41,182
AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,427
AUG 6 1964

Minneapolis Tribune
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
D. 215,803 SUN. 651,844
AUG 2 1964

KINGSTON, N.Y.
FREEMAN
D. 17,200
AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 101,591
AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
American (e)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,200
AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111
AUG 6 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Morning Globe
Morn. Circ. 202,711
AUG 6 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Chronicle (e)
WILLIMANTIC, Conn.
Circ. 7,116
AUG 6 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Berkshire Eagle
Eve. Circ. 29,304
AUG 5 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,427
AUG 1964

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,797 SUN. 116,106
AUG 6 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02105 - 742-4200
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
Hampshire Gazette
Eve. Circ. 13,499
AUG 5 1964

Leinsdorfs Invited To White House

At the invitation of President and Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf will attend a White House dinner Thursday evening in honor of the United Nations Secretary U Thant. In order to keep his rehearsal schedule for the coming Tanglewood weekend, which includes much "Music for Festivals," the Leinsdorfs will fly to Washington by chartered plane from the Pittsfield airport. They are scheduled to return early Friday morning to allow Mr. Leinsdorf to continue with his rehearsals.

The "Music for Festivals" to be heard this weekend includes Menotti's "The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi," Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," and Liszt's Fantasia on Themes from "Ruins of Athens." The Beethoven and Menotti works will be performed on Saturday evening with the Liszt Fantasia on Sunday afternoon. "Music for Festivals" is a term used by Mr. Leinsdorf for music that lends itself particularly for programming "at a Festival such as we have at Tanglewood."

The Leinsdorfs also attended a White House dinner last spring for British Prime Minister Sir Alec Douglas-Home, and Mr. Leinsdorf conducted members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a White House concert at the invitation of Mrs. Johnson on March 31.

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 20 1964

About 8,000 Attend Tanglewood Gala Evening

Photos by Whitestone

CONDUCTOR'S SONS, Stan and Chris Stokowski, whose father, Leopold Stokowski, was guest conductor for last night's gala evening at Tanglewood, join Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, and daughter, Jenny, in the Leinsdorf box. Mr. Leinsdorf, BSO conductor, shared podium with Mr. Stokowski. The boys, who live in New York, also are sons of actress Gloria Vanderbilt. They are staying at Heaton Hall, Stockbridge.

FORMER STOCKBRIDGE resident Mrs. John Marshall of Boston chats with Mrs. John L. B. Brooke of Lenox on Tanglewood lawn. Mrs. Marshall, former Jeanne Millet Kelly, and her husband are visiting Mrs. Kenneth Robertson at Corby Lodge, West Stockbridge.

VISITORS FROM GERMANY Mr. and Mrs. Leslie A. Burch Jr., at rear, picnic with Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus A. Henry Jr. of 157 Jason St. The Burches will return Saturday to Bitburg, Germany, where they teach in the American Air Force School for Dependents, after spending the summer with Mr. Burch's parents in Richmond. They have been teaching in Germany for the past six years.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,705
AUG 23 1964

FOR THE DEFENSE

Today marks the end of the 1964 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., but it is not too late for the management to defend itself against charges reprinted in this column last Sunday. These came from Harvey Strauss of Brooklyn, who was up in arms because he had to pay $2.50 for the admission of his 8-month-old son.

Thomas D. Perry, Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony, quotes a statement in the festival brochure stating that "infants and children not yet ready to enjoy the concerts are discouraged from attending," and notes further that "Tanglewood is a concert hall, albeit an outdoor one, but nonetheless a place where one has the right to expect to enjoy music in a properly quiet atmosphere."

Mr. Perry concludes: "Along with our interest in young people—the audience of the future, if you will—the orchestra feels an overriding responsibility to the audience of the present. We cannot truly be expected to determine, as the audience streams through the gates, whether Mr. Strauss's 8-month-old son is prepared to listen to the music or just might let fly with a wail in the Grand Pause just before the Coda. By asking that he pay normal admission for the child to come to the concert, we put the responsibility where it should be, upon the parent, to decide whether the child is mature enough. If it is worth the cost of the ticket, we will have to take our chances on the wails. If it's not worth it, we see no reasonable grounds for vexation."

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,705
AUG 16 1964

INDIGNATION

Harvey Strauss of Brooklyn is mad at the Boston Symphony. He has written as follows to explain why:

"A note of discord was heard one Sunday at Tanglewood when my family and I arrived in eager anticipation of a pleasant summer day in the Berkshires. We were calmly informed that our 8-month-old son had to pay an admittance charge of $2.50. This charge, we were told, was made to discourage parents from bringing youngsters to Tanglewood.

"Our child is a bona fide member of our family and as such is not shuttled off to in-laws or babysitters. He rides smartly in a back carrier atop his father's or mother's back. In a word, as is his right, he partakes of those activities engaged in by his parents. Other parents were subject to this same tariff on toddlers."

NEW ENGLAND
Box 2078, Boston
WORCESTER,
Sunday Tel
Sun. Circ
AUG
Music
Orches
By RAYMOND
Telegram Music
Associated with public relations d Tanglewood. His a been a young man barked on an un
lenging, highly spe
fession in music.
John E. Gibbens native of Salem, O with promotion of shire Music Festi today. Under a Grant from the F
tion for 1963-64
pleted a season as trative intern with burgh Symphony
This season Gib
New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 20 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200
WORCESTER, MASS.
Sunday Telegram
Sun. Circ. 102,435
AUG 23 1964

Music

Orchestra Management Is Musician's Career

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Associated with the press and public relations department at Tanglewood this summer has been a young man who is embarked on an unusual, challenging, highly specialized profession in music.

John E. Gibbens, 25-year-old native of Salem, Ore., assisted with promotion of the Berkshire Music Festival that ends today. Under a Fellowship Grant from the Ford Foundation for 1963-64, he has completed a season as an administrative intern with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

This season Gibbens will serve as manager of the Richmond (Va.) Symphony Orchestra. The 76-member orchestra has an annual budget of $109,000, and gives 17 concerts under the director of Edgar Schenkman.

There are approximately 1,230 symphony orchestras in the United States, excluding some 250 youth symphony orchestras that are part of the training program of some adult groups.

Classifications

Of the grand total, 900 are classified as "community orchestras" (operating on annual budgets of less than $100,000), 280 are college and university orchestras, 27 are "metropolitan" ($100,000-$250,000 budgets), and 25 are "major" ($250,000 and up) symphony orchestras.

Most of the college and university orchestras are handled by the institutions' own administrations. This leaves about 950 symphony orchestras that stand to benefit from independent professional management.

The "metropolitan" and "major" orchestras are composed entirely of professional musicians. about 88 per cent of the 63,000 musicians playing in the nation's "community orchestras" are amateurs.

Therefore, theoretically there should be a need for 950 experienced symphony orchestra managers in this country.

Last year's Ford Foundation grants provided practical training in orchestral management to five thoroughly screened candidates in this field. Besides Gibbens in Pittsburgh, there were apprentices in the major orchestras of New York, Cleveland, Detroit and Houston.

Excellent Qualifications

Gibbens has excellent musical qualifications for the post of symphony orchestra manager. He has a bachelor of music degree from the University of Oregon, with major in cello. He has played with the Portland Symphony, Southern Oregon Philharmonic Society and University of Oregon Symphony. He was a member of the Oregon Music Teachers Association and librarian of the University of Oregon Symphony.

There's much more to the orchestra manager's job than balancing the budget, getting out press releases, tending to details of hall, program, tickets, advertising, etc.

He must also be a diplomat, referee and liaison man. He stands as the focal point from conductor, orchestra, board o trustees, press — and mayb creditors.

Also it helps if he knows mu sic. Imagine the musically un versed layman manager tryin to discuss with a conductor th box-office potential of Hinde mith's Symphonic Metamorpho sis on Themes of Carl Mari von Weber, or Schoenberg' "Verklarte Nacht."

Asked about some of thes policies, Gibbens said: "I don' feel that the manager should tr to dominate the conductor in se lection of repertory."

"What if the conductor lean heavily toward provocative con temporary music?" we wante to know.

"I'll give you a Yankee re ply to that one," said Gibbens "Let's say a certain amount o contemporary music is al right."

If adventurous programmin has detrimentally affecte ticket sales (over a period of season), Gibbens feels tha only then should the manage discuss the problems with th conductor and board of direc tors.

He opines that this should ap ply to other factors, consistentl unfavorable reviews, selectio of soloists. In connection wit the latter, Gibbens expects tha skill can always be improved in dickering with concert mana gers over artists' fees.

Gibbens is married to the former Priscilla Shafer of Med ford, Ore. Their three-year-old son Jan Aaron is already quite a promoter.

We met him outside the Tan gelwood press room and he asked: "Do you use a type writer?"

"Yes," we replied.

"So do I," said the three year-old

JOHN E. GIBBENS
Public relations man at Tanglewood

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105
AUG 16 1964

Summertime in New England—9

Music-lovers on the lawn near The Shed at Tanglewood.

COMMERCE DIGEST
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500
AUG 1964

"Tanglewood," (Photo No. 2 upper center) with its formal terraces and hedges, overlooking the beautiful lake called the Berkshire Bowl, is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Capacity crowds attend its Berkshire Festival of symphonic and chamber music, to be held this summer for eight weeks in July and August. The open-walled Music Shed holds 6,000 people; more thousands sit outside on the Great Lawn.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2378, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

WORCESTER, MASS.
Sunday Telegram
Sun. Circ. 102,435

AUG 23 1964

Music

Orchestra Management Is Musician's Career

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Associated with the press and public relations department at Tanglewood this summer has been a young man who is embarked on an unusual, challenging, highly specialized profession in music.

John E. Gibbens, 25-year-old native of Salem, Ore., assisted with promotion of the Berkshire Music Festival that ends today. Under a Fellowship Grant from the Ford Foundation for 1963-64, he has completed a season as an administrative intern with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

This season Gibbens will serve as manager of the Richmond (Va.) Symphony Orchestra. The 76-member orchestra has an annual budget of $109,000 and gives 17 concerts under the director of Edgar Schenkman.

There are approximately 1,230 symphony orchestras in the United States, excluding some 250 youth symphony orchestras that are part of the training program of some adult groups.

Classifications

Of the grand total, 900 are classified as "community orchestras" (operating on annual budgets of less than $100,000). 280 are college and university orchestras, 27 are "metropolitan" ($100,000-$250,000 budgets), and 25 are "major" ($250,000 and up) symphony orchestras.

Most of the college and university orchestras are handled by the institutions' own administrations. This leaves about 950 symphony orchestras that stand to benefit from independent professional management.

The "metropolitan" and "major" orchestras are composed entirely of professional musicians, about 88 per cent of the 63,000 musicians playing in the nation's "community orchestras" are amateurs.

Therefore, theoretically there should be a need for 950 experienced symphony orchestra managers in this country.

Last year's Ford Foundation grants provided practical training in orchestral management to five thoroughly screened candidates in this field. Besides Gibbens in Pittsburgh, there were apprentices in the major orchestras of New York, Cleveland, Detroit and Houston.

Excellent Qualifications

Gibbens has excellent musical qualifications for the post of symphony orchestra manager. He has a bachelor of music degree from the University of Oregon, with major in cello. He has played with the Portland Symphony, Southern Oregon Philharmonic Society and University of Oregon Symphony. He was a member of the Oregon Music Teachers Association and librarian of the University of Oregon Symphony.

There's much more to the orchestra manager's job than balancing the budget, getting out press releases, tending to details of hall, program, tickets, advertising, etc.

He must also be a diplomat, referee and liaison man. He [illegible] conductor, orchestra, board trustees, press — and mayb creditors.

Also it helps if he knows mu sic. Imagine the musically un versed layman manager tryin to discuss with a conductor th box-office potential of Hind mith's Symphonic Metamorpho sis on Themes of Carl Mari von Weber, or Schoenberg' "Verklarte Nacht."

Asked about some of thes policies, Gibbens said: "I don feel that the manager should tr to dominate the conductor in s lection of repertory."

"What if the conductor lean heavily toward provocative con temporary music?" we wante to know.

"I'll give you a Yankee r ply to that one," said Gibbens "Let's say a certain amount o contemporary music is a right."

If adventurous programmin has detrimentally affecte ticket sales (over a period of season), Gibbens feels tha only then should the manage discuss the problems with th conductor and board of direc tors.

He opines that this should ap ply to other factors, consistentl unfavorable reviews, selectio of soloists. In connection wit the latter, Gibbens expects tha skill can always be improve in dickering with concert mana gers over artists' fees.

Gibbens is married to th former Priscilla Shafer of Med ford, Ore. Their three-year-ol son Jan Aaron is already quit a promoter.

We met him outside the Tan gelwood press room and h asked: "Do you use a type writer?"

"Yes," we replied.

"So do I," said the three-

JOHN E. GIBBENS
Public relations man at Tanglewood

COMMERCE DIGEST
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500

AUG 1964

"Tanglewood," (Photo No. 2 upper center) with its formal terraces and hedges, overlooking the beautiful lake called the Berkshire Bowl, is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Capacity crowds attend its Berkshire Festival of symphonic and chamber music, to be held this summer for eight weeks in July and August. The open-walled Music Shed holds 6,000 people; more thousands sit outside on the Great Lawn.

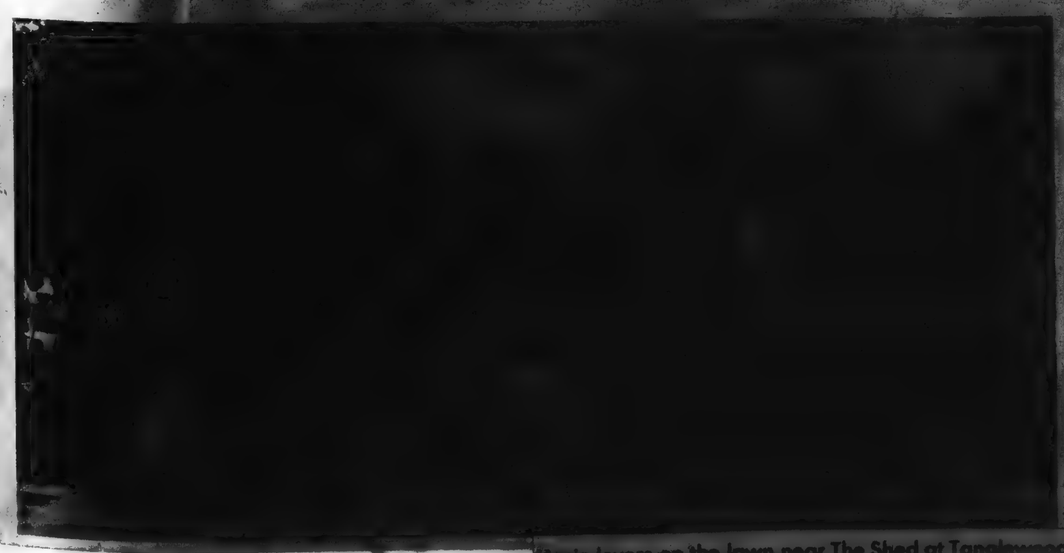
2

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2378, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 488,105

AUG 16 1964

Summertime in New England—9



Music-lovers on the lawn near The Shed at Tanglewood

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 1 1964

BSO's Hearne Will Probably Get to First Bass

Whitestone

Joseph Hearne, BSO's youngest bassist.

By Richard K. Weil

SOME EIGHT YEARS AGO in Portland, Ore., failure in sports sent 13-year-old Joseph Hearne back to success in music.

For three years Hearne had been neglecting his music study in favor of baseball and other athletics, and then it became clear that he would not excel in the field of sports. Because he believed "you have to have something that you can really do well," he drew upon previous violin training, took up the bass and began to play in a combo with his brother, Wayne, who had already achieved some success as a jazz and rock 'n roll pianist.

The decision paid off. Today, at the symphonically tender age of 21, Joseph Hearne is completing his second season in the double bass section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among the mature musicians of the BSO, he stands out to anyone in the aisled audience. He looks like a teen-ager, the kind you might expect to find in a youthful jazz band. Youngest member of the BSO by five or six years, Hearne nonetheless feels at home with his colleagues. "Musicians meet as musicians," he says, and no matter what the age difference, "they treat each other as equals." He doesn't mention whether the relationships alter when he dates their daughters, which he does.

The youthful bassist proudly points out that Henri Girard, oldest member of the BSO, is also in the double bass section. Girard is more than 50 years Hearne's senior.

* * *

But being so young has its problems too.

"At my age, by all rights, I should be a student," Hearne says. "This job tends to cut me off from people my own age. Other students are either somewhat awed or mad because I got the job."

With a secure position in a great symphony orchestra, Hearne has at last found time to engage in a hobby outside the field of music.

Last year William Waterhouse, a BSO violinist, persuaded him to take up flying. Early this summer Hearne made his first solo flight near Boston. While at Tanglewood, he is continuing to train out of the Great Barrington airport.

Flying has become such an obsession that Hearne is thinking of getting a private pilot's license and flying on tours with Waterhouse and "whoever else is brave enough to go with us."

* * *

Joseph Hearne was born in Lorain, Ohio, the youngest of three children. One of his earliest memories is riding with his family on the interurban trolley to attend the Cleveland Symphony concerts.

He started piano lessons at the age of six and took up the violin two years later. When he was 12, the family moved to Portland, where Joseph began to play in the Portland Junior Symphony. Late in his high school years, he spent summers at the Aspen (Colo.) music festival.

In January, 1962, during his second year at Juilliard School of Music, his instructor suggested that, for experience, Hearne should audition for the Boston Symphony.

To the amazement of all but the auditioners, Hearne got the job, and the following Sept. 23, at the age of 20, he helped open the BSO's 82nd season.

On tour the following spring, the BSO stopped at Portland and in a special concert, Joseph performed two double bass concertos with the Portland Junior Symphony.

Although somewhat of a prodigy, Hearne admits "conducting is beyond my realm of thought." Someday, he says, it would be nice to be principal of his section, but he is in no hurry to get to first bass.

His current ambitions are to stay with the BSO, continue his studies and take a little time to let his years catch up with his position. Anxious to get his degree, Hearne takes part-time courses at the New England Conservatory during the winters.

"People are either doers or knowers," Joseph says. "So far, I have been a doer. Now, I want to learn something about music."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 18 1964

NO FREE ADMISSIONS FOR BABES AT TANGLEWOOD

A patron of the recently-ended Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, has publicly expressed resentment at having had to pay $2.50 to get his eight-months-old son into a concert there.

Replying that infants and children not yet ready to enjoy the concerts are discouraged from attending, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., the personable and fluent manager of the Boston Symphony, states the orchestra's position in such matters:

"Tanglewood is a concert hall, albeit an outdoor one, but nonetheless a place where one has the right to expect to enjoy music in a properly quiet atmosphere.

"Along with our interest in young people — the audience of the future, if you will — the orchestra feels an overriding responsibility to the audience of the present."

He pointed out that, as the audience streams through the gates, the Festival management cannot be expected to determine whether the eight-months child is "prepared to listen to the music, or just might let fly with a wail in the Grand Pause just before the Coda."

"By asking that he pay normal admission for the child to come to the concert, we put the responsibility where it should be, upon the parent, to decide whether the child is mature enough. If it is worth the cost of the ticket, we will have to take our chances on the wails. If it's not worth it, we see no reasonable grounds for vexation."

SEPT. 15 1964 Bushnell Prompter

Love Affair With Boston Symphony Revealed by Soprano Phyllis Curtin

By ANDREW CLARKE

In the world of the arts there are few persons who have had as illustrious a career in recent years as soprano Phyllis Curtin. At the same time there are few who have been less affected by fame.

Taking a few precious minutes from her rigorous schedule at Tanglewood last week, where she is teaching as well as performing, Miss Curtin reminisced in an articulate and yet engaging fashion about her life as a star of both opera and the concert stage.

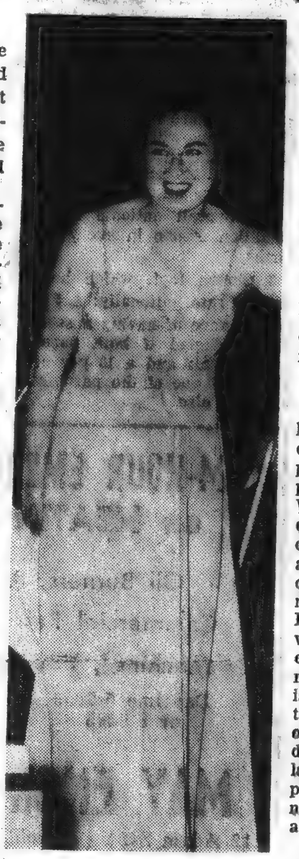
Recital Challenge

She is equally at home in either idiom, and although she has been called as fine an actress as she is a singer, she does not prefer one over the other. "Actually," Miss Curtin says, "recitals are more challenging since there is always the problem of instantly communicating the mood of a song within a very short time and then having to repeat the process in each successive number. In opera, however, one has the benefits of scenery, costumes and other actors, as well as a continuous plot." She added that recitals are more strenuous for her, because, "unlike singing an operatic role, a singer's success or failure is determined solely by how well she sings and not at all by other considerations."

Miss Curtin's very evident success has also created a great demand for her services among the world's leading orchestras, including those of Boston, New York and Philadelphia in this country. Last year she made 56 such appearances, including 12 with the Boston Symphony. "The Boston was the first major orchestra I ever heard," she says, "and I've had a love affair with it ever since." Their "affair" began when Miss Curtin was an undergraduate at Wellesley College and used to attend concerts in Symphony Hall in Boston.

Now on Faculty

Since that time she has spent many summers at Tanglewood, including three as a voice student, and is now on the Berkshire Music Center faculty as a teacher of vocal technique. Miss Curtin is very devoted to Erich Leinsdorf because "he cares terribly about singing, unlike many conductors." She sang under him in the City Center Opera Company's New York premiere of "Susannah" by Carlisle Floyd in which she had also starred at the Brussels World Fair in 1958. (Her success at Brussels led directly to a very successful series of engagements at Vienna, La Scala, in England and elsewhere.) "Leinsdorf has a rare respect for and understanding of singers," says Miss Curtin, admitting that she's delighted at having additional opportunities to work with him.



Whitestone

Phyllis Curtin

Last summer, she sang in the American premiere of Britten's "War Requiem" at Tanglewood and this year helped to celebrate the Strauss centennial with a performance of "Hymns." She is also giving a solo recital tonight. Thus far she has made two recordings with the BSO — excerpts from Berg's "Wozzeck," soon to be released, and "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," by Debussy, which was recorded when Charles Munch was the orchestra's conductor and which features a narration by him.

New Works

Miss Curtin is well known for her interest in presenting new or seldom-heard works to the public. Among her favorite composers is the Austrian Hugo Wolf, a late 19th century writer of songs whose compositions frequently dot her programs. She also is a staunch defender of contemporary vocal music. "I'm not afraid of new music nor do I think of it as anti-vocal. Badly written 12-tone music is, of course, difficult to sing, but good music isn't. Berg, for instance, is marvelous. But by the same token, even the great Beethoven occasionally blundered, as evidenced by the quartet in the last movement of his Ninth Symphony. Today's composers are no better or worse than those of any other time."

Another interest of Miss Curtin's is Latin-American folk music, and she recently completed a recording of Latin-American songs.

Political Interest

Undeniably, then, Phyllis Curtin is an extremely versatile singer. But as if this weren't enough, she also happens to be an ardent student of political affairs, an interest stemming from her Wellesley days where she majored in political science. She expressed concern over certain current political trends in America, and said she wished she had more time to promote the causes of internationalism and tolerance.

Perhaps it would be a good idea if Miss Curtin were named "official roving ambassador" so that citizens in other lands could see and hear this beautiful, talented, and intelligent ideal of American womanhood.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 1 1964

BSO's Hearne Will Probably Get to First Bass

Whitestone

Joseph Hearne, BSO's youngest bassist.

By Richard K. Weil

SOME EIGHT YEARS ago in Portland, Ore., failure in sports sent 13-year-old Joseph Hearne back to success in music.

For three years Hearne had been neglecting his music study in favor of baseball and other athletics, and then it became clear that he would not excel in the field of sports. Because he believed "you have to have something that you can really do well," he drew upon previous violin training, took up the bass and began to play in a combo with his brother, Wayne, who had already achieved some success as a jazz and rock 'n roll pianist.

The decision paid off. Today, at the symphonically tender age of 21, Joseph Hearne is completing his second season in the double bass section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among the mature musicians of the BSO, he stands out to anyone in the concert audience. He looks like a teen-ager, the kind you might expect to find in a youthful jazz band. Youngest member of the BSO by five or six years, Hearne nonetheless feels at home with his colleagues. "Musicians meet as musicians," he says, and no matter what the age difference, "they treat each other as equals." He doesn't mention whether the relationships alter when he dates their daughters, which he does.

The youthful bassist proudly points out that Henri Girard, oldest member of the BSO, is also in the double bass section. Girard is more than 50 years Hearne's senior.

* * *

But being so young has its problems too.

"At my age, by all rights, I should be a student," Hearne says. "This job tends to cut me off from people my own age. Other students are either somewhat awed or mad because I got the job."

With a secure position in a great symphony orchestra, Hearne has at last found time to engage in a hobby outside the field of music.

Last year William Waterhouse, a BSO violinist, persuaded him to take up flying. Early this summer Hearne made his first solo flight near Boston. While at Tanglewood he is continuing to train out of the Great Barrington airport.

Flying has become such an obsession that Hearne is thinking of getting a private pilot's license and flying on tours with Waterhouse and "whoever else is brave enough to go with us."

* * *

Joseph Hearne was born in Lorain, Ohio, the youngest of three children. One of his earliest memories is riding with his family on the interurban trolley to attend the Cleveland Symphony concerts.

He started piano lessons at the age of six and took up the violin two years later. When he was 12, the family moved to Portland, where Joseph began to play in the Portland Junior Symphony. Late in his high school years, he spent summers at the Aspen (Colo.) music festival.

In January, 1962, during his second year at Juilliard School of Music, his instructor suggested that, just for experience, Hearne should audition for the Boston Symphony.

To the amusement of all but the auditioners, Hearne got the job, and the following Sept. 23, at the age of 20, he helped open the BSO's 82nd season.

On tour the following spring, the BSO stopped at Portland and in a special concert, Joseph performed two double bass concertos with the Portland Junior Symphony.

Although somewhat of a prodigy, Hearne admits "conducting is beyond my realm of thought." Someday, he says, it would be nice to be principal of his section, but he is in no hurry to get to first bass.

His current ambitions are to stay with the BSO, continue his studies and take a little time to let his years catch up with his position. Anxious to get his degree, Hearne takes part-time courses at the New England Conservatory during the winters.

"People are either doers or knowers," Joseph says. "So far, I have been a doer. Now, I want to learn something about music."

NO FREE ADMISSIONS FOR BABES AT TANGLEWOOD

A patron of the recently-ended Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, has publicly expressed resentment at having had to pay $2.50 to get his eight-months-old son into a concert there.

Replying that infants and children not yet ready to enjoy the concerts are discouraged from attending, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., the personable and fluent manager of the Boston Symphony, states the orchestra's position in such matters:

"Tanglewood is a concert hall, albeit an outdoor one, but nonetheless a place where one has the right to expect to enjoy music in a properly quiet atmosphere.

"Along with our interest in young people — the audience of the future, if you will — the orchestra feels an overriding responsibility to the audience of the present."

He pointed out that, as the audience streams through the gates, the Festival management cannot be expected to determine whether the eight-months child is "prepared to listen to the music, or just might let fly with a wail in the Grand Pause just before the Coda."

"By asking that he pay normal admission for the child to come to the concert, we put the responsibility where it should be, upon the parent, to decide whether the child is mature enough. If it is worth the cost of the ticket, we will have to take our chances on the wails. If it's not worth it, we see no reasonable grounds for vexation."

SEPT. 15, 1964 Bushnell Prompter

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 16 1964

Love Affair With Boston Symphony Revealed by Soprano Phyllis Curtin

By ANDREW CLARKE

In the world of the arts there are few persons who have had as illustrious a career in recent years as soprano Phyllis Curtin. At the same time there are few who have been less affected by fame.

Taking a few precious minutes from her rigorous schedule at Tanglewood last week, where she is teaching as well as performing, Miss Curtin reminisced in an articulate and yet engaging fashion about her life as a star of both opera and the concert stage.

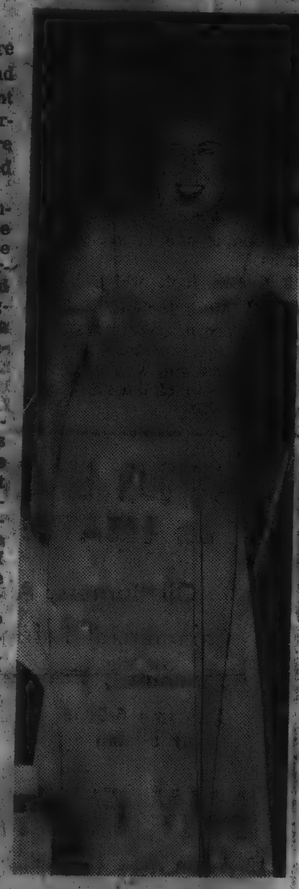
Recital Challenge

She is equally at home in either idiom, and although she has been called as fine an actress as she is a singer, she does not prefer one over the other. "Actually," Miss Curtin says, "recitals are more challenging since there is always the problem of instantly communicating the mood of a song within a very short time and then having to repeat the process in each successive number. In opera, however, one has the benefits of scenery, costumes and other actors, as well as a continuous plot." She added that recitals are more strenuous for her, because, "unlike singing an operatic role, a singer's success or failure is determined solely by how well she sings and not at all by other considerations."

Miss Curtin's very evident success has also created a great demand for her services among the world's leading orchestras, including those of Boston, New York and Philadelphia in this country. Last year she made 56 such appearances, including 12 with the Boston Symphony. "The Boston was the first major orchestra I ever heard," she says, "and I've had a love affair with it ever since." Their "affair" began when Miss Curtin was an undergraduate at Wellesley College and used to attend concerts in Symphony Hall in Boston.

Now on Faculty

Since that time she has spent many summers at Tanglewood, including three as a voice student and is now on the Berkshire Music Center faculty as a teacher of vocal technique. Miss Curtin is very devoted to Erich Leinsdorf because "he cares terribly about singing, unlike many conductors." She sang under him in the City Center Opera Company's New York premiere of "Susannah" by Carlisle Floyd in which she had also starred at the Brussels World Fair in 1958. (Her success at [illegible] led directly to a very [illegible] series of engagements [illegible] La Scala, in England and elsewhere.) "Leinsdorf has a rare respect for and understanding of singers," says Miss Curtin, adding that she's delighted at having additional opportunities to work with him.



Whitestone

Phyllis Curtin

Last summer, she sang in the American premiere of Britten's "War Requiem" at Tanglewood and this year helped to celebrate the Strauss centennial with a performance of "Hymns." She is also giving a solo recital tonight. Thus far she has made two recordings with the BSO — excerpts from Berg's "Wozzeck," soon to be released, and "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," by Debussy, which was recorded when Charles Munch was the orchestra's conductor and which features a narration by him.

New Works

Miss Curtin is well known for her interest in presenting new or seldom-heard works to the public. Among her favorite composers is the Austrian Hugo Wolf, a late 19th century writer of songs whose compositions frequently dot her programs. She also is a staunch defender of contemporary vocal music. "I'm not afraid of new music nor do I think of it as anti-vocal. Badly written 12-tone music is, of course, difficult to sing, but good music isn't. Berg, for instance, is marvelous. But by the same token, even the great Beethoven occasionally blundered, as evidenced by the quartet in the last movement of his Ninth Symphony. Today's composers are no better or worse than those of any other time."

Another interest of Miss Curtin's is Latin-American folk music, and she recently completed a recording of Latin-American songs.

Political Interest

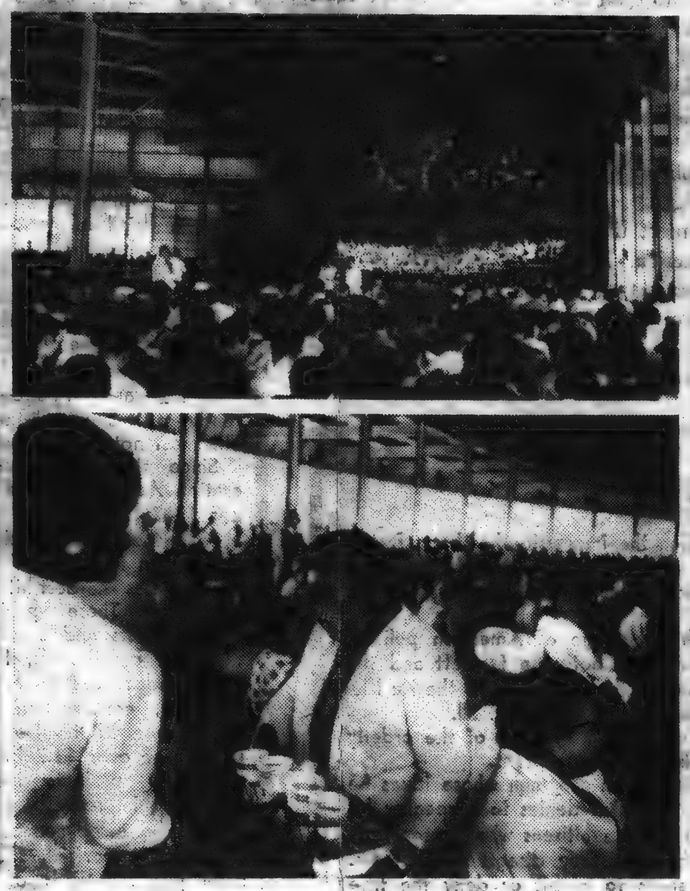
Undeniably, then, Phyllis Curtin is an extremely versatile singer. But as if this weren't enough, she also happens to be an ardent student of political affairs, an interest stemming from her Wellesley days where she majored in political science. She expressed concern over certain current political trends in America, and said she wished she had more time to promote the causes of internationalism and tolerance.

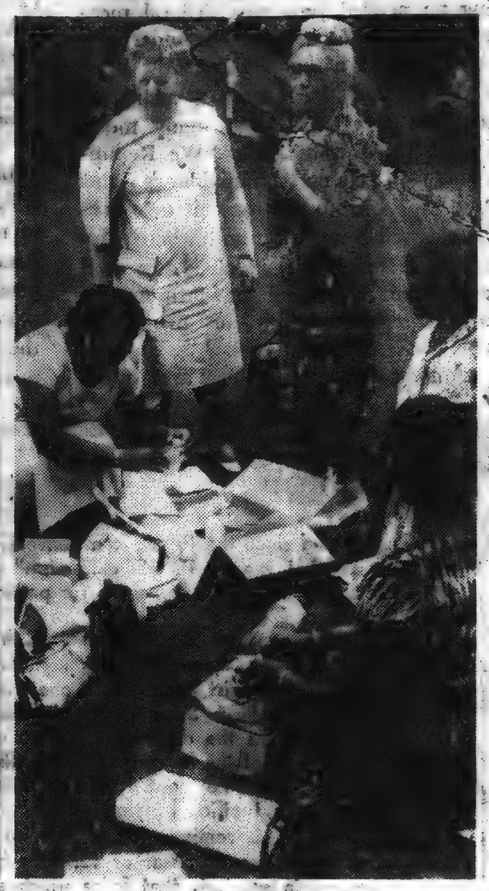
Perhaps it would be a good idea if Miss Curtin were named "official roving ambassador" so that citizens in other lands could see and hear this beautiful, talented, and intelligent ideal of [illegible]

JERSEY CITY, N. J.
JUSTICE
SEMI-MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

AUG 15 1964

62ers Listen, Loll, Sip and Stroll at Berkshire Music Festival





Ninety travelers from New York Local 62 spent the weekend of August 1 lolling and strolling in the Berkshires at music and dance festivals at Tanglewood and Jacob Pillow, according to Matthew Schoenwald, local [illegible] transported the members of the ILGWU [illegible] and negligee affiliate to the Massachusetts [illegible], where the group attended the Jacob's Pillow dance festival at the Ted Shawn Theatre on Saturday night. Sunday afternoon, they attended a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

In between, the ILGers stayed overnight in Albany, just a short run to either festival. The group ate picnic lunches on the spacious Tanglewood estate, strolled its picturesque grounds and formal gardens and then attended the concert in the famous music shed (see pictures above).

The dance program featured sparkling interpretations of both modern dance and traditional ballet. The concert, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, provided a varied music fare which included compositions by Dvorak, Bartok and Strauss.

The garment workers then left the Berkshires via bus for the scenic ride back to New York City along the Hudson River.

On August 15, Local 62 held a one-day outing to Hecksher State Park on Long Island.

And at Tanglewood, early arrivals at concert performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra explored the scenic grounds of the Music Festival site. Music shell in background resembles the floss of a wedding cake.

People stood patiently in line to purchase tickets to Tanglewood performances at the height of the Berkshire Festival season. Were you There?

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 114,397
SEP 6 1964

TROY August 29, 1964

The Tanglewood Student Orchestra at rehearsal.

Elizabeth Bishop

Road To A Musical Career

Stephen Morris with Erich Leinsdorf

John Bergamo

By Anthony Polsky

THE CLARION NOTES of a trumpet, softened by the antiphony of French horns blended with a choir, heralded the opening bars of a Bach cantata.

The music swelled not in a concert hall, but through the trees and over the rolling Berkshire Hills of western Massachusetts.

By the town of Lenox sits Tanglewood, a well-kept former estate that is now the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Over 10,000 people often sit on a spacious lawn and in an open music shed, listening to summer concerts by the B. S. O. under the directorship of Erich Leinsdorf.

For six highly talented Bergen County musicians, participation in Tanglewood's Berkshire Music Center this summer has provided additional enrichment to their musical careers.

"I'm here for clear professional reasons: to conduct and to continue my career," said 33-year-old Melvin Strauss of Leonia. Strauss and Larry Newland of Hackensack are two of four assistant conductors at Tanglewood this summer.

Newland is studying under a Bernstein Conducting Fellowship and Strauss has been given a grant from the Fromm Foundation.

A violist with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Newland also is conductor of the Rutherford Choral Society. Strauss is an associate professor of music at Rutgers University and conductor of the New Jersey Oratorio Society.

As they sat over lunch at an outdoor cafeteria overlooking the beautifully landscaped Tanglewood grounds, the musicians enthusiastically pointed out a number of luminaries from the music world—soloists, "first chair" musicians from the world's great orchestras, composers, and famed music teachers.

"It's the contact and interaction with other musicians that's most valuable to me," said Vera Tisheff of Englewood. Already an accomplished pianist who has played at Carnegie Recital Hall, the 28-year-old musician has studied at the Eastman School of Music, Yale University, and the Juilliard School. She studied privately with Mme. Rosina Lhevinne, who has taught many famed concert pianists.

A musical family motivated Stephen Morris, 19, of Wyckoff toward a career in musicology. He is studying at Vocal Music department this summer, as an accompanist.

After 3 years at the Putney School in Vermont, Morris entered Harvard University, where currently he is a junior.

"My father [an executive in an engineering firm] composes music because he loves it, and my mother plays the piano for the same reason," he said.

"While I was at Putney, my father induced me to take a general music history course. I started piano when I was 7, but it was the music course that really set my mind on musicology," Morris said.

At Harvard, he has been a volunteer teacher of music at a hospital for the criminally insane and at a juvenile reformatory. He leaves for Europe in the fall for 1 year's study of composition at the Free University of Berlin.

For Elizabeth Bishop, 22, of Park Ridge, Tanglewood is a musically meaningful summer interlude before returning this fall to the Eastman School of Music in Rochester for an advanced degree in music education.

Her entire family is musical, and both Elizabeth and her mother have played with the Ridgewood Symphony. Miss Bishop also has played the bassoon in the Bergen County Orchestra and the All-State Orchestra.

Miss Bishop plans to teach music, although she expects to continue with the bassoon as much as possible.

Having lived in Bergen County all his life, John Bergamo, 24, of Palisades Park, looks with mixed feelings at his departure this fall to take the post of creative associate at Buffalo University.

A percussionist, Bergamo has developed a special interest in contemporary music. At Tanglewood, he participated in a special program financed by the Rockefeller Foundation in which a series of special concerts of the so-called "New Music" are given.

As the summer program draws to an end today, each musician will go his separate way along the often arduous path set for young people interested in a musical career. But they all agree the pervasive and stimulating environment of Tanglewood will remain with them.

LISTEN
A MUSIC MONTHLY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
10 TI. A YR. - CIRC. N. AVAIL

SEP 1964

Serge Koussevitsky (1874-1951)

Serge Koussevitsky

The season of 1965 will see the 25th anniversary of the opening of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Masschusetts. A major contributor to the growth of American musical life, Tanglewood owes its creation to the genius of Serge Koussevitsky.

A great virtuoso on the double bass—a responsible music publisher who made a notable contribution to the world's store of great music through his encouragement of such composers as Scriabin, Stravinsky, Prokokieff, Medtner, and Rachmaninoff—a distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose 25 years of service marked a high point in creative programming and service to the music of his time—Serge Koussevitsky (affectionately known as "Koussie" to generations of Tanglewood students) is, through the effervescent and noble spirit which he transmitted to so many of his students, a force in American music even today.

The above photograph was taken at an informal birthday party for Dr. Koussevitsky, held at Tanglewood in the late 1940's.

INSTRUMENTALIST
EAVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 15,000

SEP 1964

Research with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Ralph R. Pottle

IT IS SOMETIMES SAID THAT PROfessional music organizations shun research for fear of coming into conflict with established tradition. But anyone acquainted at all with the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will acknowledge that it has assumed leadership in experimentation on numerous occasions and has identified itself with progressive movements since before 1900. In fact, it was in 1890 that the Boston Symphony Orchestra adopted the new musical pitch of A-440 and thereby became the stabilizing agency for musical pitch in America where there was indecision on whether to use the "A-435 low pitch" or a higher frequency being used at the time in Europe.

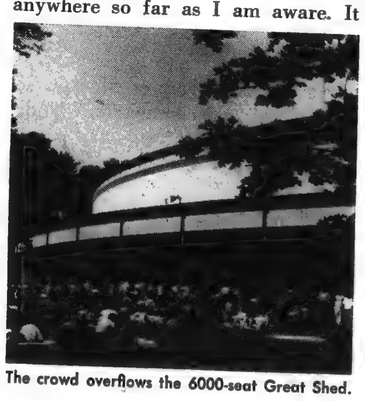
The Boston Symphony Orchestra launched out in the 1930's in pursuit of a quality loosely termed brilliancy whereupon Maestro Serge Koussevitsky had the orchestra tuning as high as A-444. This move necessitated cutting operations on practically all of the wind instruments in order that the higher frequency be reached with minimum intonation departures. It also necessitated procurement of new keyboard percussion instruments—xylophone, marimba, bells, chimes and celesta—which were tuned to A-444. Without arguing the wisdom of such a move, it demonstrated again the unhesitating quality of leadership which has characterized the BSO since before the turn of the century.

Rudolf Serkin and the Boston Symphony.

In September 1962, Maestro Erich Leinsdorf assumed the role of conductor and musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Concurrently, first oboist Ralph Gomberg decided to launch out anew in search of a tuning frequency which would afford greatest comfort in playing. His experiments led to the adoption of a flexible A-442 for performance in normal temperature. This appeared to be a desirable compromise inasmuch as the modified wind instruments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra could not be brought down to the normal A-440. And again, we find the BSO in search—this time in the opposite direction.

Seeking Truth Through Research

It is most enlightening to see highly skilled professional music aggregations welcoming experimentation and research, as do industrial organizations, to assist in finding the most plausible means of accomplishing any task. In 1963 while on summer Sabbatical leave it was my good fortune to be invited by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to carry out a research project, during its eight-week Tanglewood session, on the subject of tuning and intonation. The privilege of engaging in an exploration of this nature is a rarity indeed—the first ever carried out anywhere so far as I am aware. It demonstrates anew the attitude of progressiveness so characteristic of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One could hardly hope for a more ideal situation for such an experiment, for all musical performances were given under the Great 6000 seat open Shed with only a roof over it, and so local weather conditions prevailed with their full intensity. We experienced temperatures all the way from 59°F. to 90°F., relative humidity from 44 to 100, and barometric pressure from 28.295 to 29.100 according to readings by the local weather bureau. In addition, I kept a thermometer on the stage of the Great Shed knowing that lighting equipment would modify to some extent the prevailing outside temperature.



The crowd overflows the 6000-seat Great Shed.

To provide for my Strobotuner, microphone, field glasses, and writing space, I was assigned a television platform in the Great Shed about twelve feet above the first violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From this location, I could see the entire orchestra, and it was from here that I monitored 70 three-hour sessions, 48 of which were regular rehearsals and 22 of which were formal concepts. The eight-week session opened on Monday, July 1, and closed on Sunday, August 25.

For this research project, I established four specific objectives: (1) to ascertain the physical factor or factors which exerted greatest influence upon tuning frequency, (2) to identify the family of instruments most subject to this influence, (3) to determine the ideal tuning frequency of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and (4) to identify the temperature level at which this ideal is best achieved. As the summer progressed, some unanticipated objectives occurred not the least interesting of which were requests by several of the solo and first chair players to monitor their solos for accuracy of intonation. I hasten to emphasize that these people sought errors too tiny for detection by human ears but which would show on the dial of an electronic instrument.

Erich Leinsdorf and the Orchestra in concert.

1. I found that atmospheric temperature of the stage area was the element which exerted greatest influence upon the tuning frequency of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I grouped the temperature readings into five-degree gradients beginning at 59°F. I found that eight of the 70 sessions took place when the reading was between 59° and 63°F. Fourteen sessions were held when the thermometer showed 64° to 68° F., twenty-three sessions took place in temperature between 69° and 73°F (normal range), twelve sessions were played when the temperature stood between 74° and 78°F., eight sessions were held when the temperature was between 79° and 83°F., and five sessions were played when the temperature stood between 84° and 90°F. After tabulating the frequency readings for each temperature level, I found that the orchestra performed at a higher frequency every time the stage temperature showed above normal, and that it performed at a lower frequency every time the temperature dropped below normal.

2. I found that wind instruments were most affected by—and therefore most difficult to control in—a changing temperature situation. On hot days all wind instruments, including the pipe organ, sharped. It is well known that pipe organs sharp at the rate of 18 cents (a cent is 1/100th of a half-step) for each 10°F. rise in temperature and that they flat at the same ratio when temperature falls. All other wind instruments sharp or flat in much the same manner except for the modifying influence of the warm breath of the players. Wind instruments of standard construction are provided with limited tuning leeway based upon A-440 to care for situations in which there occur small deviations from normal temperature. However, there is no provision for occasions when ambient temperature rises to 85°F. or drops to 60°F. Moreover, such instruments as xylophone, marimba, orchestra bells, piano, chimes, etc. remain relatively steady in fluctuating temperature which makes it imperative that wind instruments be retuned by performers when the temperature climbs above or falls below normal.

Ralph R. Pottle is Head of the Department of Fine Arts, Southeastern Louisiana College. He received the Bachelor's degree from the New Orleans Conservatory, and Master's degrees from Louisiana State University and Teacher's College, Columbia University. He earned the Ph.D. degree at Peabody College for Teachers. Dr. Pottle is the author of the book, Tuning the School Band, and has lectured throughout the nation on the subjects of tuning and intonation.

3. In searching for the ideal tuning frequency of the BSO, I reminded myself that professional symphony musicians seem always perceptive when certain physical and acoustical elements combine favorably to enhance their performance. They cannot explain this perception, but they sense it, and in a subconscious manner, the message transmits itself from one to the other. I utilized this unexplainable inner sense to help analyze and ascertain the frequency at which the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed last summer with greatest precision of intonation. The level had been established informally at A-442 for normal temperature. However, electronic measurement indicated that A-441½ was the frequency at which greatest precision was attained, and also the level at which this unusual perc viou seemed also
dom from restraint which generated a feeling of confidence. In questioning players, while probing for this ideal tuning frequency, I was reminded by several performers on wind instruments that it is more comfortable, and therefore easier, to play down to a flat standard than to play up to a sharp standard. Thus, the act of lowering the tuning frequency for normal temperature from A-444 to A-442 was generally applauded as a prudent move and assuredly in the right direction.

4. It should be pointed out that this ideal frequency of A-441½ (for the Boston Symphony Orchestra)* was achieved in only one temperature region—that between 69° and 73°F. I monitored the orchestra at this temperature level during 23 three-hour sessions which should constitute validity. Emphasizing the importance of a steady normal temperature should also argue strongly in favor of thermostatically controlled cooling and heating for all halls in which symphony orchestras perform regularly.

*Symphony orchestras in which wind instruments of standard construction are used will likely find A-440 the best frequency.

Research Appreciated

Soon after this research was completed, I sent to the Administration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a summary of my findings. It was in the form of a confidential report. Some aspects of that report are included in this discourse.

An insight into the continuing progressiveness of the BSO may be apprehended from letters received in response to this confidential report. Two quotes are submitted herewith:

Many thanks for sending on your very interesting observations on the BSO tuning this past summer. . . . We shall look forward to seeing you again. . . .

—Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Manager

With the greatest interest I have just finished reading your confidential report to the BSO on observations based on monitorings made during Tanglewood sessions last summer. The material is absolutely fascinating and entirely invaluable. I know of nowhere else that such a fine examination has ever been made. . . . We are gratified and I am sure that our Orchestra will benefit very much by your work with it.

—Rosario Mazzeo, Personnel Manager

FINE

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Traveler
Eve. Circ. 161,453

AUG 22 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Herald
Morn. Circ. 176,483

AUG 22 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Traveler
Eve. Circ. 161,453

AUG 22 1964

6 MUSICIANS LEAVING BOSTON SYMPHONY

Three members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are retiring this season and three others are leaving the orchestra for other posts.

All of them were honored recently at the traditional retirement luncheon at Tanglewood.

Of those retiring, Louis Speyer, English horn, has given the longest service. He joined the orchestra in 1918 when Karl Muck was conductor. Jean de Vergie, oboe, who had been with the orchestra since 1925, was not present because illness had dictated that he retire from active duty at the end in Boston.

Vladimir Resnikoff, of the first violin section, became a member of the orchestra in 1932, under the directorship of Serge Koussevitzky.

The orchestra also expressed appreciation to Samuel Mayes, principal cello; and his wife Winifred Winograd Mayes, cello; and Joseph dePasquale, principal viola. All three will join the Philadelphia Orchestra in the coming season.

DePasquale became a member of the orchestra in 1947; Mr. Mayes, in 1948; and Mrs. Mayes, in 1957.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1964

◆ ARTHUR BERGER, composer-in-residence this past summer at the Berkshire Music Center (the school at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.), was interviewed by The New York Times's Theodore Strongin during one of the reporter's visits to Tanglewood.

Strongin noted: ". . . as a teacher and critic, his talk, as well as his music, has the authority of experience. It is an authority he does not belabor. . . .

"He is not a member of the two most-talked-of and most fashionable groups today, the random composers and the electronic composers. The random composers are the ones who leave many more choices to the performer to make as he goes along than are traditional to concert music."

"My objection," Berger said, "is that I don't see how I can sufficiently rely on a performer as my fellow composer."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304

AUG 21 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 - 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Monitor
Eve. Circ. 174,093

AUG 25 1964

By Whitestone

Louis Speyer, English horn, and Vladimir Resnikoff, first violin, hold watches given at retirement luncheon of Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, made presentation at Tanglewood. Also honored were Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Mayes and Joseph dePasquale, joining Philadelphia Orchestra.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 – 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Traveler
Eve. Circ. 161,453

AUG 22 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 – 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Herald
Morn. Circ. 176,483

AUG 22 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 – 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Traveler
Eve. Circ. 161,453

AUG 22 1964

6 MUSICIANS LEAVING BOSTON SYMPHONY

Three members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are retirng this season and three others are leaving the orchestra for other posts.

All of them were honored recently at the traditional retirement luncheon at Tanglewood.

Of those retiring, Louis Speycr, English horn, has given the longest service. He joined the orchestra in 1918 when Karl Muck was conductor. Jean de Vergie, oboe, who had been with the orchestra since 1925, was not present because illness had dictated that he retire from active duty at the end in Boston.

Vladimir Resnikoff, of the first violin section, became a member of the orchestra in 1932, under the directorship of Serge Koussevitzky.

The orchestra also expressed appreciation to Samuel Mayes, principal cello; and his wife Winifred Winograd Mayes, cello; and Joseph dePasquale, principal viola. All three will join the Philadelphia Orchestra in the coming season.

DePasquale became a member of the orchestra in 1947; Mr. Mayes, in 1948; and Mrs. Mayes, in 1957.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1964 R.K.R.

◆ ARTHUR BERGER, composer-in-residence this past summer at the Berkshire Music Center (the school at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.), was interviewed by The New York Times's Theodore Strongin during one of the reporter's visits to Tanglewood.

Strongin noted: ". . . as a teacher and critic, his talk, as well as his music, has the authority of experience. It is an authority he does not belabor. . . .

"He is not a member of the two most-talked-of and most fashionable groups today, the random composers and the electronic composers. The random composers are the ones who leave many more choices to the performer to make as he goes along than are traditional to concert music."

"My objection," Berger said, "is that I don't see how I can sufficiently rely on a performer as my fellow composer."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 ♦ RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304

AUG 21 1964

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 02106 – 742-4200

BOSTON, MASS.
Monitor
Eve. Circ. 174,093

AUG 25 1964

By Whitestone

Louis Speyer, English horn, and Vladimir Resnikoff, first violin, hold watches given at retirement luncheon of Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, made presentation at Tanglewood. Also honored were Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Mayes and Joseph dePasquale, joining Philadelphia Orchestra.

MUSIC JOURNAL
ANTHOLOGY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
ANNUAL-CIRC.N.AVAIL.

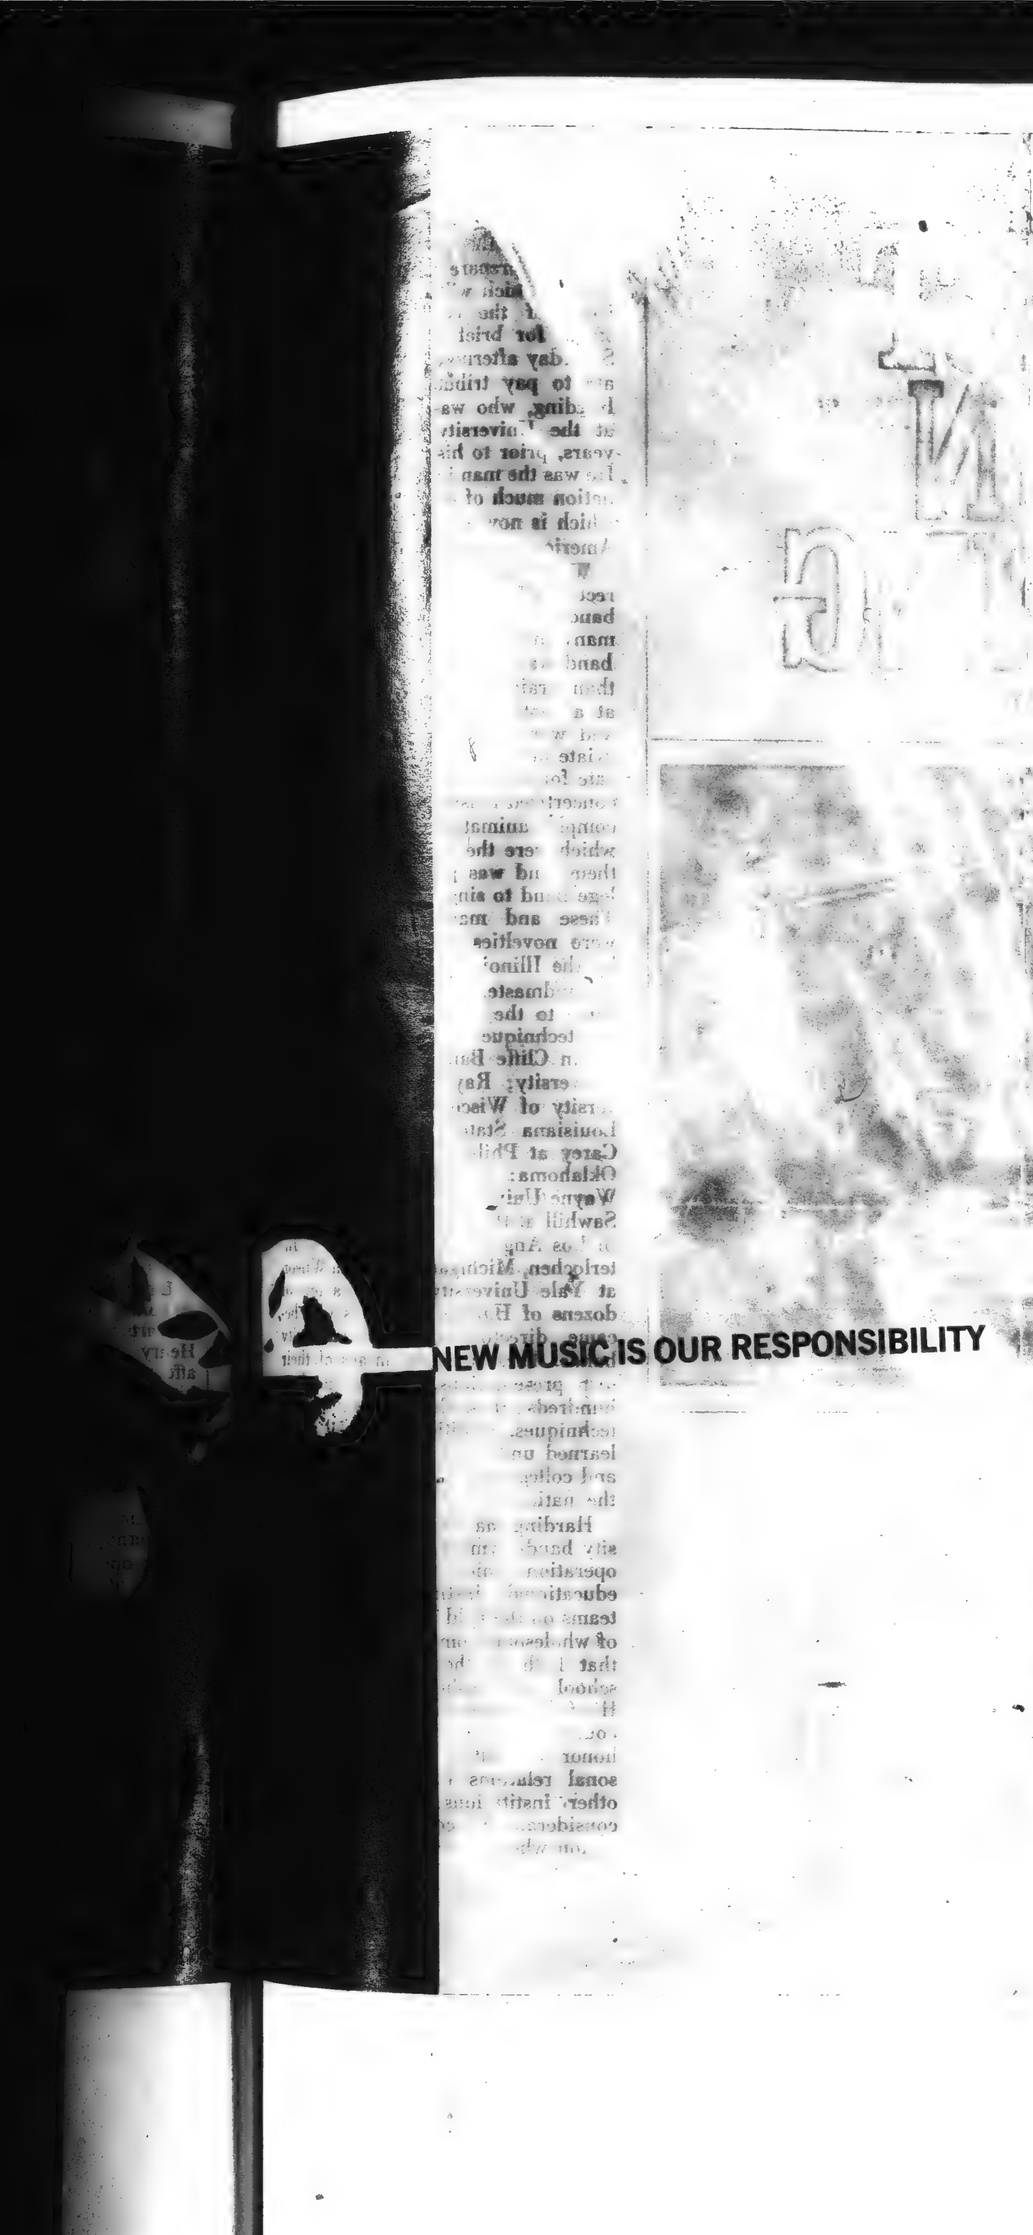
1964

CHARLES MUNCH has for so many years held such a revered and affectionate place in the minds and hearts of the music-loving public that little can now be said that wouldn't appear redundant. However, by way of recapitulation, it may be recalled that he was born in Strasbourg in 1891, studied violin under Capet and Flesch and conducting under Furtwängler. He didn't make his debut as a conductor until the age of 41, but thereafter rose to eminence rapidly. Following years of brilliant work, notably in Paris, he was engaged to succeed Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a position he held from 1949 to 1962.

MUSIC JOURNAL
ANTHOLOGY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
ANNUAL-CIRC.N.AVAIL.

1964

CHARLES MUNCH has for so many years held such a revered and affectionate place in the minds and hearts of the music-loving public that little can now be said that wouldn't appear redundant. However, by way of recapitulation, it may be recalled that he was born in Strasbourg in 1891, studied violin under Capet and Flesch and conducting under Furtwängler. He didn't make his debut as a conductor until the age of 41, but thereafter rose to eminence rapidly. Following years of brilliant work, notably in Paris, he was engaged to succeed Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a position he held from 1949 to 1962.



NEW MUSIC IS OUR RESPONSIBILITY

BY CHARLES MUNCH

Each orchestra I conduct is like putting myself through a new examination. Orchestral musicians feel immediately what the man on the podium is like. They sense his abilities at once, and we have to be on the alert and give our best.

A conductor must have the faculty in his personality that gives the musicians the feeling of the music. Then he must learn the metier and be able to analyze the music. A conductor must be at home in all kinds of music. When I hear of a conductor who has a specialty—Mozart, let us say—then my feeling is that something is wrong.

And when people say a man is a good conductor for opera but not for concert, I begin to wonder. Opera is music, after all. I feel fortunate that I was born in Alsace. My music came from two sides—the French and the German. All art has its own climate. A conductor's life is a perpetual renewal of learning.

I am glad to have retired. In a job like Boston there are so many other things besides the music. I no longer have the enormous responsibility. In Boston I conducted from 22 to 25 weeks each season, and I was always at Tanglewood for six weeks every summer. My contract did not permit me to conduct other orchestras. When I conducted the Toscanini memorial concert in New York with Pierre Monteux and Bruno Walter I had to have special permission. And in Boston I played a new work at almost every concert, which meant frequent all-night study.

Now I can see beautiful cities I never saw before. I have already conducted in Holland, Belgium, Italy, Spain, and Portugal. In Spain I got to see the Prado, the Escorial, and other famous museums I had never had the chance to visit.

I was a concertmaster for nearly 20 years. Nine years in Strasbourg, one year in Cologne, and nine in Leipzig. I played as soloist once every year with Furtwängler, all the big concertos. Actually I had started conducting as a young student with Hans Pfitzner in Strasbourg. And all the time I was a concertmaster I was studying scores, preparing myself.

Often I was unhappy, but a conductor must be able to play. I learned to play the violin, viola, organ and trumpet when I was young. I have always been sorry that I could not play the clarinet. It was too expensive. I could not afford to buy one. As a young man, whenever I had a few extra pennies I would spend them on some work of art. (Continued on Page 80)

New Music Is Our Responsibility

(Continued from Page 39)

From Furtwängler I learned the way to take the right lines in music. But it was difficult to play with him. I often discussed with him his wavering beat that made things so hard for the orchestra. "I do it because it sounds different," he would say. This system of playing after the beat started with Nikisch. But when I conduct I want an orchestra to play precisely on the beat.

It is our responsibility to play modern music. Music is not like a picture that can be hung in a gallery where people can see it at their leisure. There are so many talents—they must hear their music. My idea has been to find four or five promising talents and to play their music consistently.

I play serial music. Why not? This music exists and is important in the development of the art. Whether anything will come of it remains to be seen. I find that it goes against a wall. I cannot go behind it.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 6 is one of the best of American symphonies. It has a construction, an organism. So often modern composers have no architecture. They build a nice house but not the kind one wants to live in. In every town on my tour I play an American composition. I made this promise to the late President Kennedy at the time we both received honorary degrees from Harvard University. After my last concert in Boston he wrote me a beautiful letter of appreciation.

But the quantity of music in the U.S.A. makes me anxious. Quantity is always a danger as opposed to quality. That is why I like my liberty. In Europe things are different. In Madrid I conduct a program twice, in Paris once. How can you play the Cesar Franck Symphony five times in succession with intensity? And each concert must be exciting. You cannot do it. You are not a machine. THE END

BLANK PAGE

POST-SEASON

205

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,611
AUG 25 1964

1964 Berkshire Festival Summary

The 29th year since Boston Symphony Orchestra first participated; Erich Leinsdorf's second season as music director of the Boston Symphony and director of the Berkshire Festival; the 24th season since the founding of the Berkshire Music Center.

The 1964 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.) closed Sunday afternoon (Aug. 23) with a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, music director. The concert also officially ended the orchestra's 83rd season, and Mr. Leinsdorf's second season as music director, during which the orchestra presented 194 concerts, in Boston, on tour, and at Tanglewood.

The 1963-64 season included several major highlights, among them the Boston and New York premieres of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem"; the Solemn Pontifical Mass of Requiem in conjunction with Mozart's "Requiem" in memory of John F. Kennedy, celebrated by Richard Cardinal Cushing in the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, Boston, recorded by RCA Victor the royalties and normal proceeds from which were contributed to the Kennedy Memorial Library, Boston; a Governor's Reception for Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra in Doric Hall at the State House, Boston the first such occasion to be held since the Civil War; and a concert by 36 members of the orchestra in the East Room of the White House, at the invitation of Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson, for 250 children from the Embassy delegations to the United States.

The first two weeks of the 1964 Berkshire Festival consisted of six concerts by a chamber orchestra composed of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf. Three Mozart programs were presented, an all-Haydn program and the first all-Schubert program at Tanglewood, and a concert of Mozart and Richard Strauss. The full Boston Symphony Orchestra presented 18 concerts in the remaining six weeks of the festival.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted nine of these concerts, and his guest conductors included Eugene Ormandy (three concerts); William Steinberg (two concerts); Max Rudolf, Richard Burgin, Seiji Ozawa, and Leopold Stokowski. Gunther Schuller conducted his own composition on August 7. Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Pops Orchestra on July 22 for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Institution, with Allan Sherman, guest artist.

Soloists at the 1964 Berkshire Festival were the singers Eunice Alberts, Lucine Amara, Donald Bell, Helen Boatwright, Charles Bressler, Walter Carringer, Lili Chookasian, Phyllis Curtin, Justino Diaz, Sarabeth Endich, Ezio Flagello, June Genovese, Mac Morgan, Jerold Siena, George Shirley and Helen Vanni.

Patricia Peardon and Mr. Morgan were narrators. The guest pianists were Claudio Arrau, Jorge Bolet, Van Cliburn, Malcolm Frager and Lorin Hollander. Guest choruses were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director; and the Chorus pro Musica of Boston, Alfred Nash Patterson, director; and a children's chorus drawn from eight camps in the immediate vicinity.

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were soloists were Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster; Joseph dePasquale, Principal Viola; Samuel

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Town Times
OAKVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 2,382
AUG 27 1964

1964 Berkshire Festival Summary

Mayes, Principal Cello; Ralph Gomberg, Principal Oboe; Gino Cioffi, Principal Clarinet; Sherman Walt, Principal Bassoon; James Stagliano, Principal Horn; and Bernard Zighera, Piano.

Mr. Leinsdorf's areas of concentration in this year's Festival were Music for Chamber Orchestra, Music for Festivals, and a cycle of Richard Strauss works in observance of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth (June 11, 1864). During the eight-week season Berkshire Festival audiences heard two American premieres and 31 other works which had not been performed previously at the Festival concerts. The composers represented at the twenty-four concerts are as follows: Mozart (15), Strauss (13), Beethoven (9), Wagner (8), Debussy (3), Haydn (3), Brahms (2), Hindemith (2), Mahler (2), Mendelssohn (2), Ravel (2), Schubert (2), Stravinsky (2); and one each by Bartok, Bizet, Dvorak, Elgar, Hovhaness, Liszt, Menotti, Moussorgsky, Piston, Rorem, Schuller, Schumann, Sibelius, Smetana, Sydeman, Tchaikovsky, and Verdi.

At the eight Tuesday Evening Chamber Music Concerts, which benefit the Berkshire Music Center, the New York Pro Musica, Noah Greenberg, Musical Director, gave a program of Elizabethan Music; Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Ralph Berkowitz, piano, presented a recital; the Harvard Glee Club-Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, Director, gave a choral concert; Claudio Arrau, pianist, played a program of Mozart sonatas; the Beaux Arts Trio of New York presented a program; Jorge Bolet, pianist, gave a recital; the Lenox Quartet presented four contemporary works, in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation; and Phyllis Curtin, soprano, presented a song recital.

The Berkshire Music Center, the summer academy of music which is maintained and operated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in conjunction with the Berkshire Festival, this year had an enrollment of 290 members from 35 states and 11 foreign countries. Erich Leinsdorf served as Director for his second season and Aaron Copland was Chairman of the Faculty. The very active program of the Music Center included over forty musical programs by the young musicians; a Musicological Symposium with eleven leading musicologists of this country; a String Symposium including eighteen leading string players and teachers, aided by a grant from the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, Inc.; a five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music, in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation; and a four-week Seminar in Contemporary Music for music educators, supported by a grant from the MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education, a six-year project begun in July 1963 by the Ford Foundation.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
AUG 1964 Buffalo

Tanglewood

The 1964 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood reflected from the outset the impact of Erich Leinsdorf, both on the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he has now headed for two full seasons, and on the planning and programming of the Festival. The slow process by which a conductor imparts his musical thinking, his style, and his personality to a major symphonic ensemble is a fascinating study for the observer of the musical scene; this process is now well advanced here, and the forceful interpretive ideas and the precise performing standards of its conductor's Central European heritage were in constant evidence in the sound, the phrasing, and the approach of the Orchestra. The programming on the other hand illustrated Mr. Leinsdorf's belief that a festival should offer more than the old popular favorites and abounded in novelties from all epochs.

The opening weekend (July 3-4-5) featured works of Mozart and Haydn. The finest moments of the opening Mozart concert came in the Kyrie from the C minor Mass, inserted as a tribute to the memory of Pierre Monteux. The beloved French master who had been intimately associated with the Boston Symphony and with Tanglewood for so many years (he had been slated to conduct here this summer), could not have wished for a more moving memorial. The movement's glorious massiveness and drama were ideally captured, aided by Helen Boatwright's exquisite soprano solo and the Festival Chorus' disciplined and impassioned singing. The two Mozart bills also offered two attractive major examples of "party music," performed with elegance and balance of texture and including some sweet-toned violin solos by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein; the sunny "Linz" Symphony (No. 36) and the profound and stormy G minor (No. 40) were given appropriately contrasting readings, both notable for superb structural grasp, with a masterly sense of unity within each movement. Pianist Claudio Arrau appeared twice, disappointing with heavy-handed and generally labored renditions of the Concertos in

(Continued on page 22)

Tanglewood

(Continued from page 3)

B flat, K. 450, and D, K. 451. The Sunday Haydn program produced a real coup. It was the American premiere of "Applausus," a lengthy cantata composed in 1768 for a birthday celebration at a monastery in Lower Austria. In addition to being a fascinating study in stylistic evolution,—Haydn here applied many characteristically Baroque vocal devices in the recitatives, arias and ensembles while speaking in the unmistakable melodic and harmonic language of late 18th-century classicism,—it proved to be a work of impressive invention with many moments of sheer beauty. Miss Boatwright, mezzo Helen Vanni tenor Charles Bressler and bass Donald Bell, impersonating Temperance, Prudence, Justice and Fortitude in the allegorical text, coped artistically and tastefully with the score's lyrical and florid challenges. Earlier Mr. Leinsdorf had offered the Symphony No. 39 in G minor, the first minor-key Haydn symphony, in a straightforward, virile performance; Miss Vanni had brought refined control to her solo contribution, a late Haydn aria of exquisite Mozartean line and flavor.—H.F.

Erich Leinsdorf, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the second weekend at Tanglewood July 10-12, selected mostly works which had never before been performed at the festival. The major work of the Friday night program, Schubert's Mass in E flat, received a beautiful performance which brought out all its lyric beauty. The Festival Chorus, trained by Iva Dee Hiatt, and the five vocal soloists all sang well, responding to Mr. Leinsdorf's every gesture. The following night, pianist Malcolm Frager was soloist in an all-Mozart program, playing the rarely heard F major Concerto. K. 413. He was then joined by soprano Helen Boatwright in a stunning performance of the concert aria, "Non temer, amato bene," K. 505, with piano obbligato. The Sunday afternoon concert featured the first complete performance in America of the incidental music for Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" by Richard Strauss. While this is perhaps not one of the composer's greatest works, it does have many beautiful moments, and the performance on this occasion was first rate. The narrator, Mac Morgan, and the other vocal soloists contributed to the success of the event.—D.G.

This summer marks the 100th anniversary of the birth of Richard Strauss. Erich Leinsdorf planned programs that celebrate this occasion with performances of Strauss' lesser known works as well as the old favorites. The Friday evening concert (July 17) was dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky and opened with a selection of interludes from the Strauss opera "Die Frau ohne Schatten." The highlight of the program (and of the weekend) was a beautifully delineated performance of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, a work which is abundantly inventive. Mr. Leinsdorf projected its depth, contrasting moods and intensity of feeling with an exquisite sense of line and color to provide a thrilling experience for the audience. Saturday night the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society assisted Mr. Leinsdorf and the BSO in performances of the "Overture and Bacchanale" from "Tannhäuser" by Wagner, the Debussy "Three Nocturnes," and "Die Tageszeiten," a song cycle of men's chorus and orchestra by Strauss. A mystical and enchanting effect was achieved by having the women's chorus sing from the back of the shed in the Wagner "Bacchanale." Likewise, by seating the women interspersed throughout the orchestra in the Debussy "Sirènes," the undercurrent of eerie excitement was heightened. On Sunday afternoon Eugene Ormandy led the same program that the late Pierre Monteux had been scheduled to conduct. The Egmont Overture and the Symphony No. 4 of Beethoven, constituting the first half, seemed adversely affected by the extremely humid weather. Perhaps the intermission rain cleared the air, but the weekend then came to a brilliant conclusion, as Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso" sparkled and the "Enigma Variations" by Elgar received a richly bravura interpretation.—C.J.

Another innovation of this Tanglewood season, instituted by Mr. Leinsdorf in his capacity as head of the Berkshire Music Center, was a 3-day, 6-session Musicological Symposium held on July 13-14-15. (The Center, an 8-weeks' course offered in conjunction with the Festival, is designed to give career-ready young musicians performing and ensemble experience under the guidance of leading artists, including the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.) The idea of the Symposium, a highly laudable one, was to bring together some of the country's foremost musicologists to discuss the problems of 18th and 19th century music, with specific reference to the concerns of the performer. Each session offered a lecture on one specific point, given by an expert in that field, followed by a discussion by the entire panel and finally by a question period involving auditors and panelists. Unfortunately this marvelous concept, needed to fill a desperate void in our training of young musicians, failed to come close to fruitful realization here. To judge from the final day's sessions,—a lecture on the sketches and published scores of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony by Donald Mintz, and one by Nicolas Slonimsky on "Russian Orchestral Sound,"—the project achieved little toward its avowed end of bringing scholars and performers closer together. The speakers' presentations were unfocused, scarcely acknowledging the nature or needs of their audience, the panelists constantly wrangled over minute points, losing all relevance to the topic at hand, and the entire tone of the proceedings offered little enlightenment or inspiration to anyone. The ludicrously small turnout testified to the sad fact that the earlier sessions had done no more to arouse interest among the eager young musicians assembled at Tanglewood. Far from suggesting the abandonment of this experiment, let it be here urged that the planners of the Center overhaul their approach to it and return to the fray with a better coordinated and intelligently staged course next season,—one which will take into account the interests and needs of the young performers it must reach.—L.F.

POST-SEASON

205

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,611
AUG 25 1964

1964 Berkshire Festival Tanglewood

The 29th year since Boston Symphony Orchestra first participated; Erich Leinsdorf's second season as music director of the Boston Symphony and director of the Berkshire Festival; the 25th season since the founding of the Berkshire Music Center.

The 1964 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.) closed Sunday afternoon (Aug. 23) with a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, music director. The concert also officially ended the orchestra's 83rd season, and Mr. Leinsdorf's second season as music director, during which the orchestra presented 194 concerts, in Boston, on tour, and at Tanglewood.

The 1963-64 season included several major highlights among them the Boston and New York premieres of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem"; the Solemn Pontifical Mass of Requiem in conjunction with Mozart's "Requiem" in memory of John F. Kennedy, celebrated by Richard Cardinal Cushing in the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, Boston, recorded by RCA Victor, the royalties and normal proceeds from which were contributed to the Kennedy Memorial Library, Boston; a Governor's Reception for Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra at Doric Hall at the State House, Boston the first such occasion to be held since the Civil War; and a concert by 36 members of the orchestra in the East Room of the White House, at the invitation of Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson, for 250 children from the embassy delegations to the United States.

The first two weeks of the 1964 Berkshire Festival consisted of six concerts by a chamber orchestra composed of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf. Three Mozart programs were presented; an all-Haydn program and the first all-Schubert program at Tanglewood, and a concert of Mozart and Richard Strauss. The full Boston Symphony Orchestra presented 18 concerts in the remaining six weeks of the festival.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted nine of these concerts, and his guest conductors included Eugene Ormandy (three concerts); William Steinberg (two concerts); Max Rudolf, Richard Burgin, Seiji Ozawa, and Leopold Stokowski. Gunther Schuller conducted his own composition on August 7. Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Pops Orchestra on July 22 for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Institution, with Alan Sherman, guest artist.

Soloists at the 1964 Berkshire Festival were the singers Eunice Alberts, Lucine Amara, Donald Bell, Helen Boatwright, Charles Bressler, Walter Carringer, Lili Chookasian, Phyllis Curtin, Justino Diaz, Sarah-mae Endich, Ezio Flagello, June Genovese, Mac Morgan, Jerold Siena, George Shirley and Helen Vanni.

Patricia Peardon and Mr. Morgan were narrators. The guest pianists were Claudio Arrau, Jorge Bolet, Van Cliburn, Malcolm Frager and Lorin Hollander. Guest choruses were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director; and the Chorus pro Musica of Boston, Alfred Nash Patterson, director, and a children's chorus drawn from eight camps in the immediate vicinity.

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were soloists were Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster; Joseph dePasquale, Principal Viola; Samuel Mayes, Principal Cello; Ralph Gomberg, Principal Oboe; Gino Cioffi, Principal Clarinet; Sherman Walt, Principal Bassoon; James Stagliano, Principal Horn; and Bernard Zighera, Piano.

Mr. Leinsdorf's areas of concentration in this year's Festival were Music for Chamber Orchestra, Music for Festivals, and a cycle of Richard Strauss works in observance of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth (June 11, 1864). During the eight-week season Berkshire Festival audiences heard two American premieres and 31 other works which had not been performed previously at the Festival concerts. The composers represented at the twenty-four concerts are as follows: Mozart (15), Strauss (13), Beethoven (9), Schumer (2), Debussy (3), Haydn (3), Brahms (2), Hindemith (2), Mahler (2), Mendelssohn (2), Ravel (2), Schubert (2), Stravinsky (2); and one each by Bartok, Bizet, Dvorak, Elgar, Hovhaness, Liszt, Menotti, Moussorgsky, Piston, Riorem, Schuller, Schumann, Sibelius, Smetana, Sydeman, Tchaikovsky, and Verdi.

At the eight Tuesday Evening Chamber Music Concerts, which benefit the Berkshire Music Center, the New York Pro Musica, Noah Greenberg, Musical Director, gave a program of Elizabethan Music; Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Ralph Berkowitz, piano, presented a recital; the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, Director, gave a chorus concert; Claudio Arrau, pianist, played a program of Mozart sonatas; the Beaux Arts Trio of New York presented a program; Jorge Bolet, pianist, gave a recital; the Lenox Quartet presented four contemporary works in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation; and Phyllis Curtin, soprano, presented a song recital.

The Berkshire Music Center, the summer academy of music which is maintained and operated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in conjunction with the Berkshire Festival, this year had an enrollment of 290 members from 35 states and 11 foreign countries. Erich Leinsdorf served as Director for his second season and Aaron Copland was Chairman of the Faculty. The very active program of the Music Center included over forty musical programs by the young musicians; a Musicological Symposium with eleven leading musicologists of this country; a String Symposium including eighteen leading string players and teachers, aided by a grant from the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, Inc.; a five-day Festival of Contemporary American Music, in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation; and a four-week Seminar in Contemporary Music for music educators, supported by a grant from the MENC Contemporary Music Project for Creativity in Music Education, a program initiated in July 1963 by the Ford Foundation.

Town Times
OAKVILLE, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 2,382
AUG 27 1964

1964 Berkshire Festival Tanglewood Summary

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
AUG 1964

Tanglewood

The 1964 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood reflected from the outset the impact of Erich Leinsdorf, both on the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he has now headed for two full seasons, and on the planning and programming of the Festival. The slow process by which a conductor imparts his musical thinking, his style, and his personality to a major symphonic ensemble is a fascinating study for the observer of the musical scene; this process is now well advanced here, and the forceful interpretive ideas and the precise performing standards of its conductor's Central European heritage were in constant evidence in the sound, the phrasing, and the approach of the Orchestra. The programming on the other hand illustrated Mr. Leinsdorf's belief that a festival should offer more than the old popular favorites and abounded in novelties from all epochs.

The opening weekend (July 3-4-5) featured works of Mozart and Haydn. The finest moments of the opening Mozart concert came in the Kyrie from the C minor Mass, inserted as a tribute to the memory of Pierre Monteux. The beloved French master who had been intimately associated with the Boston Symphony and with Tanglewood for so many years (he had been slated to conduct here this summer), could not have wished for a more moving memorial. The movement's glorious massiveness and drama were ideally captured, aided by Helen Boatwright's exquisite soprano solo and the Festival Chorus' disciplined and impassioned singing. The two Mozart bills also offered two attractive major examples of "party music," performed with elegance and balance of texture and including some sweet-toned violin solos by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein; the sunny "Linz" Symphony (No. 36) and the profound and stormy G minor (No. 40) were given appropriately contrasting readings, both notable for superb structural grasp, with a masterly sense of unity within each movement. Pianist Claudio Arrau appeared twice, disappointing with heavy-handed and generally labored renditions of the Concertos in

(Continued on page 22)

Tanglewood

(Continued from page 3)

B flat, K. 450, and D, K. 451. The Sunday Haydn program produced a real coup. It was the American premiere of "Applausus," a lengthy cantata composed in 1768 for a birthday celebration at a monastery in Lower Austria. In addition to being a fascinating study in stylistic evolution,—Haydn here applied many characteristically baroque vocal devices in the recitatives, arias and ensembles while speaking in the unmistakable melodic and harmonic language of late 18th-century classicism,—it proved to be a work of impressive invention with many moments of sheer beauty. Miss Boatwright, mezzo Helen Vanni tenor Charles Bressler and bass Donald Bell, impersonating Temperance, Prudence, Justice and Fortitude in the allegorical text, coped artistically and tastefully with the score's lyrical and florid challenges. Earlier Mr. Leinsdorf had offered the Symphony No. 39 in G minor, the first minor-key Haydn symphony, in a straightforward, virile performance; Miss Vanni had brought refined control to her solo contribution, a late Haydn aria of exquisite Mozartean line and flavor.—H.F.

Erich Leinsdorf, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the second weekend at Tanglewood July 10-12, selected mostly works which had never before been performed at the festival. The major work of the Friday night program, Schubert's Mass in E flat, received a beautiful performance which brought out all its lyric beauty. The Festival Chorus, trained by Iva Dee Hiatt, and the five vocal soloists all sang well, responding to Mr. Leinsdorf's every gesture. The following night, pianist Malcolm Frager was soloist in an all-Mozart program, playing the rarely heard F major Concerto. K. 413. He was then joined by soprano Helen Boatwright in a stunning performance of the concert aria, "Non temer, amato bene," K. 505, with piano obbligato. The Sunday afternoon concert featured the first complete performance in America of the incidental music for Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" by Richard Strauss. While this is perhaps not one of the composer's greatest works, it does have many beautiful moments, and the performance on this occasion was first rate. The narrator, Mac Morgan, and the other vocal soloists contributed to the success of the event.—D.G.

This summer marks the 100th anniversary of the birth of Richard Strauss. Erich Leinsdorf planned programs that celebrate this occasion with performances of Strauss' lesser known works as well as the old favorites. The Friday evening concert (July 17) was dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky and opened with a selection of interludes from the Strauss opera "Die Frau ohne Schatten." The highlight of the program (and of the weekend) was a beautifully delineated performance of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, a work which is abundantly inventive. Mr. Leinsdorf projected its depth, contrasting moods and intensity of feeling with an exquisite sense of line and color to provide a thrilling experience for the audience. Saturday night the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society assisted Mr. Leinsdorf and the BSO in performances of the "Overture and Bacchanale" from "Tannhäuser" by Wagner, the Debussy "Three Nocturnes," and "Die Tageszeiten," a song cycle of men's chorus and orchestra by Strauss. A mystical and enchanting effect was achieved by having the women's chorus sing from the back of the shed in the Wagner "Bacchanale." Likewise, by seating the women interspersed throughout the orchestra in the Debussy "Sirènes," the undercurrent of eerie excitement was heightened. On Sunday afternoon Eugene Ormandy led the same program that the late Pierre Monteux had been scheduled to conduct. The Egmont Overture and the Symphony No. 4 of Beethoven, constituting the first half, seemed adversely affected by the extremely humid weather. Perhaps the intermission rain cleared the air, but the weekend then came to a brilliant conclusion, as Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso" sparkled and the "Enigma Variations" by Elgar received a richly bravura interpretation.—C.J.

Another innovation of this Tanglewood season, instituted by Mr. Leinsdorf in his capacity as head of the Berkshire Music Center, was a 3-day, 6-session Musicological Symposium held on July 13-14-15. (The Center, an 8-weeks' course offered in conjunction with the Festival, is designed to give career-ready young musicians performing and ensemble experience under the guidance of leading artists, including the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.) The idea of the Symposium, a highly laudable one, was to bring together some of the country's foremost musicologists to discuss the problems of 18th and 19th century music, with specific reference to the concerns of the performer. Each session offered a lecture on one specific point, given by an expert in that field, followed by a discussion by the entire panel and finally by a question period involving auditors and panelists. Unfortunately this marvelous concept, needed to fill a desperate void in our training of young musicians, failed to come close to fruitful realization here. To judge from the final day's sessions,—a lecture on the sketches and published scores of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony by Donald Mintz, and one by Nicolas Slonimsky on "Russian Orchestral Sound,"—the project achieved little toward its avowed end of bringing scholars and performers closer together. The speakers' presentations were unfocused, scarcely acknowledging the nature or needs of their audience, the panelists constantly wrangled over minute points, losing all relevance to the topic at hand, and the entire tone of the proceedings offered little enlightenment or inspiration to anyone. The ludicrously small turnout testified to the sad fact that the earlier sessions had done no more to arouse interest among the eager young musicians assembled at Tanglewood. Far from suggesting the abandonment of this experiment, let it be here urged that the planners of the Center overhaul their approach to it and return to the fray with a better coordinated and intelligently staged course next season,—one which will take into account the interests and needs of the young performers it must reach.—L.F.

The Seattle Daily Times
D. 226,737 SUN. 267,958

SEP 7 1964

NEW MUSIC:
Young Talent Is Explosive At Tanglewood

By ERIC SOLZMAN
New York Herald Tribune News Service

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., Sept. 7.—Whither music?

Ah, the age-old question fraught with all its usual portents of imminent doom. Twelve-tone music and aleatory, total serialization and chance, stochastic music and the happenings, dada, neo-dada and grand-dada — whatever will happen to us all?

The Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Foundation have come up with a pretty good answer to that one this summer: A great deal is happening, it's already happening right now, and a good deal of it is pretty remarkable.

The answer came in the form of a contemporary-music festival of music by young composers who, for once, really are young. There are ten composers involved, all but a couple still in their 20's and all but a couple with something to say.

There's talent in these here hills, and there's a music of the future and it's here right now.

ONE THING emerged very clearly from an intense, crowded week of new-music rehearsals, performances and discussion: there is in progress a remarkable and exciting creative development in American music which is accomplishing nothing less than the establishment of a whole new kind of performed music.

There has been, in fact, a little electronic music, some serial stuff a la Stockhausen, and a bit of Cageian chance, choose and change. But most of the best music here breaks away from the restricted, closely worked, and mutually exclusive categories of the serial and chance music that constituted the twin poles of avant-gardism only a little while ago.

The old mutual distinctions are gone, the barriers are down, the old fights have been fought. The young composers now start out with a complete indifference to the polemics of a few years ago; the old problems don't even interest them.

Instead, a whole range of compositional and instrumental technique is suddenly open, extending the possibilities of the creative experience right up to and beyond the expanding limits of performance technique and perceptibility — indeed, this new range of activity and perception is the actual subject matter of a great deal of this music. This music is free, wide-ranging, imaginative to the point of wildness, traveling to the extremes of pitch range, dynamics, accent, intensity and tempo, but growing in a very rich and meaningful way out of the realities of performance and performance practice.

There is no question that all this is a very healthy and exciting development. The new music is tied in with performers and actual performance and it banks on the widest kind of imaginative and expressive coherence, exploiting the whole range of new resources in meaningful ways.

There are problems, too. Imagination run riot is not a magic key to anything by itself, and there is a tendency for some of the young composers, as they begin to feel their oats, to begin to assume that anything they could possibly conceive will be almost automatically interesting and somewhat coherent.

As other musical factors become more and more important in the shaping of a piece, there is a tendency to become careless about pitch (i.e., rhythms and colors are perfectly conceived, but the actual frequencies have no more significance than their general contour). Amid all the wildness, there is always the tendency and the danger that imagination will imply intellectual irresponsibility.

These are very real dangers, and some of these problems have been very much in evidence. But they can be avoided or overcome by those creative talents willing and able to understand that only small minds are unable to accept certain values and intellectual ideas without sacrificing others.

NEW YORK has been represented here by a sizable and talented contingent of composers. Indeed, the New York composers have stood out so strikingly that one is tempted to define a New York school of performance-practice music.

Two of the New Yorkers, Charles Wuorinen and Harvey Sollberger, have long been associated through their new-music concerts at Columbia and through the fact that they constantly write pieces for each other to play.

The association continued up here with pianist Wuorinen's chamber concerto, written and even growing out of the sound of Sollberger's flute. The solo sounds in this piece climb from rock flute bottom to tip-top and then some; the range of accents and dynamics is incredible, and effects like the use of a controlled increasing and decreasing vibrato on held notes must be heard to be believed.

The music whistles, hoots, splutters, hisses, rumbles, clatters and shakes, but the piece is always a good deal more than mere clever sound; timbers, textures and intensities function virtually as the themes of the piece. It has sense and an expressive imagination that comes out of these very ideas.

Sollberger's big contribution was a set of chamber variations, closely related to the Wuorinen piece in certain respects but more open, more filled with space, more dependent on the play of flashing insistent ensemble sonority and the tension between fixed and free.

Another New York composer-performer was the guitarist Stanley Silverman, who was represented by his Canso for chorus and an ensemble of plucked instruments, a piece which commanded admiration both for the quality of the choral writing and for the delicate accent of the ensemble sound weaving in and around the voices. The conception here is not quite complete, but the quality of the intention that motivates the composer is remarkable and clear.

The Argentinian composer, Mario Davidovsky, now living in New York, was represented by two elegant and delightful — the words are carefully chosen— works for instruments with electronic tape. Even the problems of electronic music here are related to a new integrated conception of the role of an imaginative performed music.

Another New York talent, David del Tredici, was, from a certain point of view, the most conservatively oriented composer here. Yet his involvement with big motion and with cycles of whirling periodic structures in a work like his "I Hear an Army" for soprano and string quartet suggest concerns that are again becoming important after a long period of emphasis on musical asymmetry. And even works like the trio and quintet of Donald Martino — with their elegant, careful and profound serial structures—show a development toward an imaginative extension of these ideas into areas of greater instrumental and textural complexity and interest.

The other New Yorker, William Sydeman, at 36 the oldest and best-known of the group, was the only composer who was not here on a Fromm grant; he was chosen rather through the center and the Wechsler Foundation. Both of Sydeman's works, a chamber quartet and a big dramatic cantata on a text derived from Euripides, made a considerable impression. Sydeman uses a whole battery of far-out techniques, but he has an uncanny ability to throw in the whole avant-garde machinery, a couple of issues of "Die Reihe," and a Princeton seminar to boot, as if it were the simplest, most normal way of making music in the world. The pieces are really of great effect, clever and direct. Almost neoclassical avant-garde.

Of the Midwestern and Western composers, only Loru Rush from California and, to a limited degree, Randolph Coleman of Evanston, Ill., were importantly concerned with chance and improvisation. Both of these composers as well as John MacIver Perkins of Chicago—the composer of a pair of well-made but narrow, constricted, abstract serial works — seem somehow to be concerned with older ideas, formulated by others and as yet uncomfortably and self-consciously articulated.

The performances had their ups and downs, but in general the performers — most of them from fellowship players—turned in what were mostly miracles of skill and communication in preparing great gobs of incredibly difficult and strange new music in a few days of overwhelmingly intense concentrated work. The audiences were good-sized and amazingly with it all the way — even to the point of being uncritical.

Frankly, I doubt whether any of us—performers, listeners, composers, critics—will ever be quite the same. Now, that's my definition of a real music festi-

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1964

FESTIVALS The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., opened its season on July 3. Activities, which included chamber and orchestral concerts, panel discussions and seminars, extended through August 23.

GUNTHER SCHULLER was acting head of the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center. He also was co-chairman of the center's four-week seminar on Contemporary Music for Educators (July 27-August 23).

ARTHUR BERGER filled the composer-in-residence post at the center, replacing PIERRE BOULEZ who, because of illness, was unable to come to America to fulfill this commitment.

The Boston Symphony was the resident orchestra at the festival.

From August 9 to 13, there was a festival within a festival—the Festival of Contemporary American Music—sponsored in association with the Fromm Foundation of Chicago. Ten young composers, including DONALD MARTINO, MARIO DAVIDOVSKY, HARVEY SOLLBERGER and CHARLES WUORINEN, participated in panel discussions and had their works performed.

Other composers represented by their works during the Berkshire Festival include ARTHUR BERGER, ELLIOTT CARTER, PAUL HINDEMITH, ALAN HOVHANESS, LEON KIRCHNER, ERNST KRENEK, DANIEL PINKHAM, WALTER PISTON, GUNTHER SCHULLER and MORTON SUBOTNICK.

The Seattle Daily Times
D. 226,737 SUN. 267,958
SEP 7 1964

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
OCT 1964

NEW MUSIC: Young Talent Is Explosive At Tanglewood

By ERIC SALZMAN
New York Herald Tribune News Service

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., Sept. 7.—Whither music?

Ah, the age-old question fraught with all its usual portents of imminent doom. Twelve-tone music and aleatory, total serialization and chance, stochastic music and the happenings, dada, neo-dada and grand-dada — whatever will happen to us all?

The Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Foundation have come up with a pretty good answer to that one this summer: A great deal is happening, it's already happening right now, and a good deal of it is pretty remarkable.

The answer came in the form of a contemporary music festival of music by young composers who, for the most part, really are young. There are ten composers involved, all but a couple still in their 20's and all but a couple with something to say.

There's talent in these here hills, and there's a music of the future and it's here right now.

ONE THING emerged very clearly from an intense, crowded week of new music rehearsals, performances and discussion: there is in progress a remarkable and exciting creative development in American music which is accomplishing nothing less than the establishment of a whole new kind of performed music.

There has been, in fact, a little electronic music, some serial stuff a la Stockhausen, and a bit of Cageian chance, choose and change. But most of the best music here breaks away from the restricted, closely worked, and mutually exclusive categories of the serial and chance music that constituted the twin poles of avant-gardism only a little while ago.

The old mutual distinctions are gone, the barriers are down, the old fights have been fought. The young composers now start out with a complete indifference to the polemics of a few years ago; the old problems don't even interest them.

Instead, a whole range of compositional and instrumental technique is suddenly open, extending the possibilities of the creative experience right up to and beyond the expanding limits of performance technique and perceptibility — indeed, this new range of activity and perception is the actual subject matter of a great deal of this music. This music is free, wide-ranging, imaginative to the point of wildness, traveling to the extremes of pitch range, dynamics, accent intensity and tempo, but growing in a very rich and meaningful way out of the realities of performance and performance practice.

There is no question that all this is a very healthy and exciting development. The new music is tied in with performers and actual performance and it banks on the widest kind of imaginative and expressive coherence, exploiting the whole range of new resources in meaningful ways.

There are problems, too. Imagination run riot is not a magic key to anything by itself, and there is a tendency for some of the young composers, as they begin to feel their oats, to begin to assume that anything they could possibly conceive will be almost automatically interesting and somewhat coherent.

As other musical factors become more and more important in the shaping of a piece, there is a tendency to become careless about pitch (i.e., rhythms and timbres are perfectly conceived, but no more significance than their general contour). Amid all the wildness, there is always the tendency and the danger that imaginative will imply intellectual irresponsibility.

These are very real dangers, and some of these problems have been very much in evidence. But they can be avoided or overcome by those creative talents willing and able to understand that only small minds are unable to accept certain values and intellectual ideas without sacrificing others.

NEW YORK has been represented here by a sizable and talented contingent of composers. Indeed, the New York composers have stood out so strikingly that one is tempted to define a New York school of performance-practice music.

Two of the New Yorkers, Charles Wuorinen and Harvey Sollberger, have long been associated through their new-music concerts at Columbia and through the fact that they constantly write pieces for each other to play.

The association continued up here with pianist Wuorinen's chamber concerto, written and even growing out of the sound of Sollberger's flute. The solo sounds in this piece climb from rock flute bottom to tip-top and then some; the range of accents and dynamics is incredible, and effects like the use of a controlled increasing and decreasing vibrato on held notes must be heard to be believed.

The music whistles, hoots, splutters, hisses, rumbles, clatters and shakes, but the piece is always a good deal more than mere clever sound; timbers, textures and intensities function virtually as the themes of the piece. It has sense and an expressive imagination that comes out of these very ideas.

Sollberger's big contribution was a set of chamber variations, closely related to the Wuorinen piece in certain respects but more open, more filled with space, more dependent on the play of flashing insistent ensemble sonority and the tension between fixed and free.

Another New York composer-performer was the guitarist Stanley Silverman, who was represented by his Canso for chorus and an ensemble of plucked instruments, a piece which commanded admiration both for the quality of the choral writing and for the delicate accent of the ensemble sound weaving in and around the voices. The conception here is not quite complete, but the quality of the intention that motivates the composer is remarkable and clear.

The Argentinian composer, Mario Davidovsky, now living in New York, was represented by two elegant and delightful — the words are carefully chosen — works for instruments with electronic tape. Even the problems of electronic music here are related to a new integrated conception of the role of an imaginative performed music.

Another New York talent, David del Tredici, was, from a certain point of view, the most conservatively oriented composer here. Yet his involvement with big motion and with cycles of whirling periodic structures in a work like his "I Hear an Army" for soprano and string quartet suggest concerns that are again becoming important after a long period of emphasis on musical asymmetry. And even works like the trio and quintet of Donald Martino — with their elegant, careful and profound serial structures—show a development toward an imaginative extension of these ideas into areas of greater instrumental and textural complexity and interest.

The other New Yorker, William Sydeman, at 36 the oldest and best-known of the group, was the only composer who was not here on a Fromm grant; he was chosen rather through the center and the Wechsler Foundation. Both of Sydeman's works, a chamber quartet and a big dramatic cantata on a text derived from Euripides, made a considerable impression. Sydeman uses a whole battery of far-out techniques but he has an uncanny ability to throw in the whole avant-garde machinery, "a couple of issues of 'Die Reihe,'" and a Princeton seminar to boot, as if it were the simplest, most normal way of making music in the world. The pieces are really of great effect, clever and direct. Almost neoclassical avant-garde.

Of the Midwestern and Western composers, only Lorin Rush from California and, to a limited degree, Randolph Coleman of Evanston, Ill., were importantly concerned with chance and improvisation. Both of these composers as well as John MacIver Perkins of Chicago—the composer of a pair of well-made but narrow, constricted, abstract serial works — seem somehow, to be concerned with older ideas, formulated by others and as yet uncomfortably and self-consciously articulated.

The performances had their ups and downs, but in general the performers — most of them from fellowship players—turned in what were mostly miracles of skill and communication in preparing great gobs of incredibly difficult and strange new music in a few days of overwhelmingly intense, concentrated work. The audiences were good-sized and amazingly with it all the way — even to the point of being uncritical.

Frankly, I doubt whether any of us—performers, listeners, composers, critics—will ever be quite the same. Now, that's my definition of a real music festival.

FESTIVALS The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., opened its season on July 3. Activities, which included chamber and orchestral concerts, panel discussions and seminars, extended through August 23.

GUNTHER SCHULLER was acting head of the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center. He also was co-chairman of the center's four-week seminar on Contemporary Music for Educators (July 27-August 23).

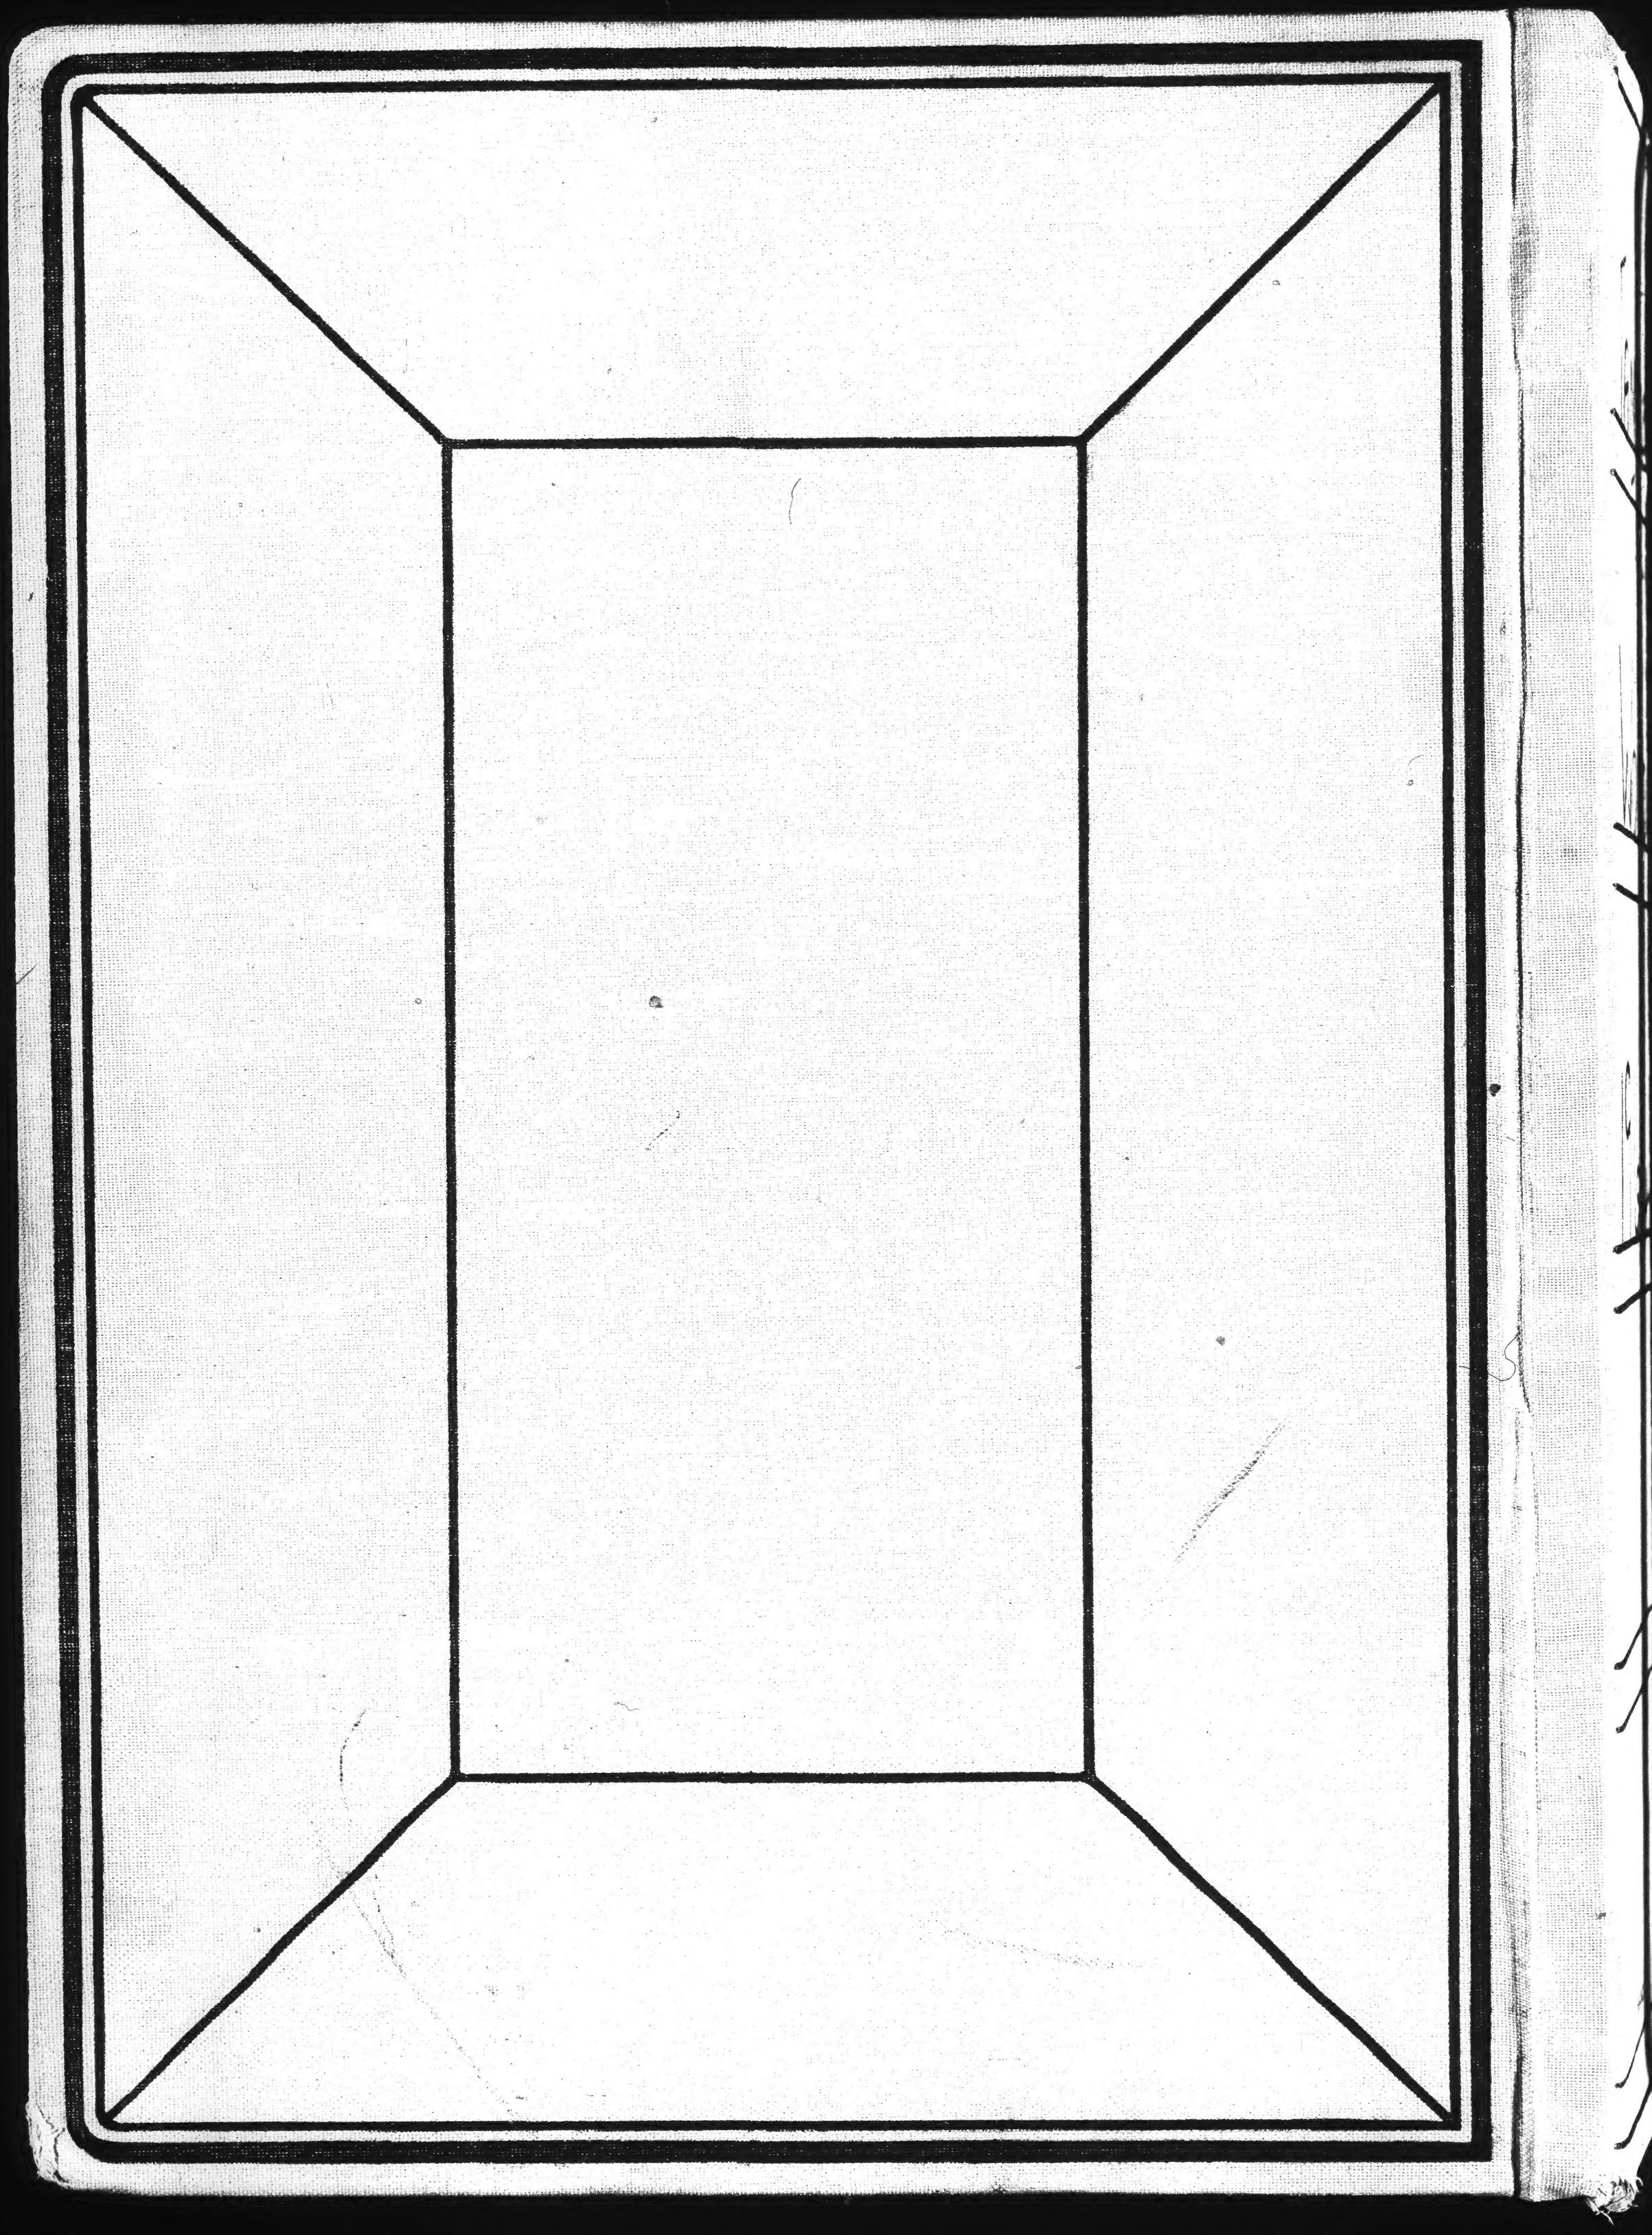
ARTHUR BERGER filled the composer-in-residence post at the center, replacing PIERRE BOULEZ who, because of illness, was unable to come to America to fulfill this commitment.

The Boston Symphony was the resident orchestra at the festival.

From August 9 to 13, there was a festival within a festival—the Festival of Contemporary American Music—sponsored in association with the Fromm Foundation of Chicago. Ten young composers, including DONALD MARTINO, MARIO DAVIDOVSKY, HARVEY SOLLBERGER and CHARLES WUORINEN, participated in panel discussions and had their works performed.

Other composers represented by their works during the Berkshire Festival include ARTHUR BERGER, ELLIOTT CARTER, PAUL HINDEMITH, ALAN HOVHANESS, LEON KIRCHNER, ERNST KRENEK, DANIEL PINKHAM, WALTER PISTON, GUNTHER SCHULLER and MORTON SUBOTNICK.

Stanford
Jordan



END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND